

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

ANNOTATED

NEW SERIES.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

UNION MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

(— Okla. —, 164 Pac. 116.)

Principal and surety — diligence of obligee.

1. The general liability of a surety upon a note, account, or bond is not conditioned upon the exercise of diligence by the holder of the obligation to collect of the principal, and the negligence or passive inactivity of the holder is not a defense available to the surety.

For other cases, see Principal and Surety, I. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — requiring proceeding against principal.

2. The term "require" as used in § 1058, Rev. Laws 1910, which provides that "a surety may require his creditor to proceed against the principal, . . . and if in such case the creditor neglects to do so, the surety is exonerated to the extent to which he is thereby prejudiced," means, to demand; to insist upon; to claim as by right and authority; to exact; to claim as indispensable, a synonym, as understood by its use in this section, for exact; direct; order; and a simple suggestion to, or request of, the creditor will not suffice.

For other cases, see Principal and Surety, I. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Bills and note — failure to sue maker — release of surety.

3. The failure of the payee of a promissory note to sue the principal, upon the oral request of the surety sued, made to the collector or attorney of the creditor, who had the note for collection, without any showing that the collector or attorney was authorized by the creditor to take legal proceedings for the collection of the note, or that such request or notice was not communicated to the creditor by the collector or attorney, will not operate as a release of the surety sued, even though the principal at the time the request was made was solvent and amply able to pay the note and in the meantime he had become insolvent, for the reason that it is the duty of the surety, upon the failure of the principal to pay the note when due, to pay the same and pursue his remedy against the principal to reimburse himself for the amount paid as such surety for his principal.

(January 2, 1917.)

ERROR to the District Court for Washita County to review a judgment in favor of defendant Hays in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Wilson & Scott and S. C. Burnette, for plaintiff in error:

The surety is not released by reason of making demand upon the creditor to sue the principal, he being solvent at the time of the making of the demand and insolvent at the time of the suit, but the surety should protect himself by means of the provisions of the law made for his benefit.

The collector had no authority whatever in the premises, and the plaintiff received none and was not bound with any notice; and such as was claimed to be given the collector was not such a demand as the law requires.

Smith v. Freyler, 4 Mont. 489, 47 Am. Rep. 358, 1 Pac. 214; Hier v. Harpster, 76 Kan. 1, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 204, 90 Pac. 817, 13 Ann. Cas. 919; Ray v. Brenner, 12 Kan. 105; Halderman v. The notice must amount to a command; it is not sufficient to express a hope, a wish, or a desire; nor will it be a sufficient compliance for the surety to give a hint; to make a request; to urge; to suggest; to advise; or to state that the surety refuses to remain liable, or that he will not pay except under compulsion. The notice must be in effect a demand to sue, and be more than instructions to dun the principal.

Mr. Richard A. Billups for defendant in error Hays.

Robberts, C., filed the following opinion:

This action was brought by the Union Mutual Insurance Company, plaintiff in error, against Hattie Page and J. H. Hays, defendants in error, to recover on a promissory note given by defendants to plaintiff as premium for hail insurance policy on 60 acres of cotton for the season of 1911. The note is as follows:

Hail Insurance.

$76. Enid, Okla., March 18, 1911.

On or before the 1st day of October of this year, for value received, I, we, or either of us, promise to pay to the Union Mutual Insurance Company, of Enid, Oklahoma, or order, the sum of seventy-six and <sup>50</sup>/<sub>100</sub> dollars, payable at the office of said company in Enid, Oklahoma.

This note is given for premium for insurance on my crop of grain, now growing on the W.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of section 1, township 11, range 20, and on the — acres in all, situated in Washita county, state of Oklahoma, and this indenture, made on the day above written, and between the undersigned and the said company, witnesseth: That the undersigned mortgages to said company the said crop of grain, as security for the payment to said company the above-named sum of money on or before the 1st day of October of this year, and this mortgage shall also cover said grain wherever located after it is harvested. This note to bear interest at 10 per cent per annum from date, if not paid at maturity. Without interest if paid when due. I agree to pay an attorney fee of \$10, if it becomes necessary to collect the above sum of money or any part thereof by law, or if it be placed in the hands of an attorney for collection.

Hattie Page.
J. H. Hays.

Witness: Aug. Gumuster.
Policy No. 05475.

P. O., Canute.

No service was had upon defendant Page. Defendant Hays answered as follows:

"Comes now the defendant J. H. Hays, and for answer to plaintiff's bill of particulars denies each, every, and all allegations therein, except such as are hereinafter specifically admitted.

"First. Defendant J. H. Hays admits that he signed the note named in plaintiff's bill of particulars as a surety and accommodation signer, and received no benefits in consideration therefor, believing that said company was lawfully authorized by the state of Oklahoma to write the kind of insurance that the principal of said note, Hattie Page, desired; to wit, hail insurance on a cotton crop. That on or about the date of the policy here involved, to wit, March 21, 1911, the State Insurance Commissioner, Honorable Perry A. Ballard, revoked the license of said Union Mutual Insurance Company, stating that said company has no legal right to write hail insurance on crops at that date. That by reason of the foregoing state of facts, consideration for which this defendant, J. H. Hays, signed said note never lawfully existed, or if the same ever existed it wholly failed when the said Insurance Commissioner revoked the license of the said company.

"Second. For a further answer and defense, defendant alleges that the plaintiff herein, in the fall of 1911, and after said note was due and collectable, neglected, failed, and refused to make an effort to collect said note from the principal, Hattie Page; that this defendant J. H. Hays asked and requested plaintiff to proceed to collect said note while the principal was in possession of a cotton crop from which this note could have been made, if the same was legal; that this defendant informed plaintiff at the time referred to herein that said cotton crop was all the protection that he as a surety had; and that he, defendant J. H. Hays, wanted this matter settled at once for his protection; that by reason of plaintiff's failure to so proceed against said principal, Hattie Page, as requested, said cotton has been disposed of by Hattie Page, and said Hattie Page is insolvent and has no means out of which any part of said debt can be made, to the damage of said defendant to the amount of his liability and said note."

Upon these issues, trial was had to a jury, verdict returned for defendant, and judgment rendered against plaintiff for costs. Plaintiff brings error.

It is apparent from the verdict that the jury found for this defendant on the allegation that he was only surety on the note; and, while there might be some question as to that fact, we will adopt the finding of the jury and consider the case upon that theory.

This brings us to the proposition as to whether the defendant Hays was released and relieved from payment of the note because of the laches of the plaintiff in failing to proceed against the principal, or taking some steps to obtain payment out of the cotton belonging to the principal and pointed out to the agent of the plaintiff about the time of the maturity of the note. In support of his defense upon that theory, the defendant relies on § 1058, Rev. Laws 1910, which is as follows:

"1058. A surety may require his creditor to proceed against the principal, or to pursue any other remedy in his power which the surety cannot himself pursue, and which would lighten his burden; and if in such case the creditor neglects to do so, the surety is exonerated to the extent to which he is thereby prejudiced."

We gather from the record that the defendant relies principally upon that part of the section above quoted, which provides that a surety may require his creditor to proceed against the principal, and, if the creditor fails to do so, the surety is exonerated to the extent to which he is thereby prejudiced.

The particular steps taken by defendant Hays to require the plaintiff to proceed against the principal are detailed in his testimony given at the trial, as follows:

A. She got the crop insurance provided I signed her note. I signed her note. She wanted it signed for hail insurance, and I signed it.

Q. Had she signed the note at the time you did?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And came to you afterwards?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have any conversation with the company or any of its agents with reference to this note in the year 1911?

A. I did.

Q. Tell the jury what it was.

A. I had no further conversation until fall. The first conversation I had with the agent was in the spring. That fall there came another man, a collector.

Q. State whether or not he had this note for collection.

A. He did. Mrs. Page refused to pay it, and so did I. I says, "There's two bales picked there, three picked, two on the ground and one on the wagon." I says, "You go and attach that cotton."

Q. What further statement did you make to him, if any, about attaching the cotton?

A. I told him to go ahead and attach the cotton and get his money out of it.

Q. Did you tell him in what capacity you had signed the note?

A. Yes, sir; he said he didn't want to attach the cotton. He would rather not, but he finally said he would, but he never did attach it. I told him if he would attach the cotton the parties would undoubtedly make a replevin bond and sell the cotton and he would have a bond the court would take, which would be much better than a note on me, and he would get his money. That was the only chance he had on it,—for him to take the cotton. I couldn't get it.

Q. What became of the cotton?

Q. About how much cotton was picked and in the field at the time?

A. I believe at that time there had been about five bales sold, and I think the crop made about twenty-three bales. There was three bales picked at that time, or a little better.

Q. There was about eighteen in the field and on the ground and the wagon?

A. Something like that. There was five bales already sold and three bales picked, and the rest was in the field. Twenty-three bales out of the whole crop.

Q. Where is Mrs. Page at this time, if you know?

A. I don't know.

Q. Do you know whether she has any property at all in this country, or anywhere else?

A. If she has any, I don't know of it.

Q. Did she have anything at that time except this cotton?

A. She had a few stock.

Q. Do you think there was ample cotton at that time to settle this debt?

A. There was enough cotton picked there to settle it then.

Q. Do you remember who the gentleman was who came and talked to you in October?

A. Said his name was Webb.

Q. You say you told Mr. Webb to go and attach the cotton?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that in writing?

A. No, sir.

Q. You never did give the company any written notice?

A. No, sir.

Q. You never did offer to pay the expenses or indemnify them against any expense in the matter?

A. No, I never did.

Q. The only reason you didn't protect yourself was from the fact that you thought you had a way to beat the note?

A. Well, I just looked at it like this: I would have to pay the note out of my own pocket, and I couldn't get anything out of her, and if they couldn't I didn't think I could.

Q. Why didn't you when you saw that Mrs. Page was disposing of this security that was behind that note that you proposed,—why didn't you say something to Mrs. Page about paying the note?

A. We did talk about it.

Q. Did you ever suggest to her to pay the note?

A. I told her I would like to get it off of my hands.

Q. When she was telling you what she thought she could do from her advice, did you take any steps or make any remonstrations against her not making security against the note?

A. No.

Q. You never requested her to make you safe in any way so in case of litigation you would be protected?

A. Yes, sir; she told me she was going to leave, and she says, "If you ever have any trouble about that, I'll pay it." But she says, "You'll have never any trouble about it."

A. And on that assurance from her you let the matter drift and paid no more attention to it?

A. That's all I could do.

Q. John, when did you last see her?

A. I haven't seen her since she left the farm.

Q. When did she leave?

A. I don't know when she left, whether the first of 1912 or the last of 1911, but some time either the first of that year or the last, sometime along there.

Q. Where is she now?

A. I don't know.

Q. At that time she had some stock, you say?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And she was leaving the state, you say?

A. Well, I don't know whether she was moving then to—somewhere in the northern part of this state. I forget the name of the place now.

Q. The note was then past due?

A. Oh, yes.

Q. You made no effort to secure yourself at all?

A. No.

Q. You rested on the assurance or the advice you had received that this company couldn't collect it because of the invalidity of the company as a corporation?

A. Well, yes; that's about all there was to it.

Q. You didn't think the company had any right to sue you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That was your advice?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You went and sought counsel about it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And because of the defense you had on its organization and right to do business in this state—that was the reason you didn't pay it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. This crop matured, and Mrs. Page held the policy all during the season of 1911?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You retained the policy and received the benefits?

A. Which benefits?

Q. You had the insurance on the crop?

A. She had the insurance.

Q. I understand. Your note was outstanding at that time?

A. Yes, sir; the note was outstanding at that time.

There is testimony tending to show that at the time the collector demanded payment of the notes, being the time the conversation above related was had, the agent promised defendant that he would attach the cotton pointed out to him as belonging to Mrs. Page, but for some reason, which is not explained, he did not do so. There is no evidence on behalf of defendant Hays that he relied on that promise. There is no evidence tending to show that the agent had authority to bring the action, nor that he ever communicated the defendant's request to the company. There is no evidence tending to show that legal grounds existed for attachment against the principal. There is no evidence tending to show that Hays made any other or further effort to require the plaintiff to proceed against the principal. There was no evidence tending to show that the defendant notified the company of its agent that, in case the plaintiff failed to proceed against the principal, he, as surety, would hold himself discharged. The full purport of the evidence is that Hays, for his defense, relied upon the fact that the plaintiff could not recover because the plaintiff's license to transact business in Oklahoma had been revoked. At the conclusion of the testimony, the court gave the following instruction, among others: "If you find and believe from a preponderance of the evidence of this case that the defendant Hays signed said note as surety, that when the plaintiff presented said note for collection after its maturity the defendant Hays notified the plaintiff that he was surety on said note only, and requested and demanded of the plaintiff that they proceed and take legal steps to enforce collection of the note against the principal, Mrs. Page, by attachment of her cotton, and that the company failed to do so, and that by reason of such failure the defendant Hays has been damaged to the full amount of the note sued upon, if you so find, your verdict should be for the defendant J. H. Hays; otherwise, you should find against him, and in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount of the note sued on."

It is apparent from the language of this instruction that the trial court was of the opinion that all that was necessary to a complete exoneration on the part of the surety was to notify or request the creditor to proceed against the principal. Nor do we overlook the fact that the word "demand" is used in the instruction, but the evidence does not justify in any sense the use of that word. There is no evidence even tending to show that the defendant demanded that the creditor proceed against the principal. The proof is simply to the effect that the defendant suggested or possibly requested the creditor to attach certain property belonging to the principal. As we view the authorities, this is not sufficient. Many of the authorities go to the extent of holding that "an unheeded request by a surety that the creditor proceed against the principal, after the maturity of a note, and while the principal is solvent, will not operate to discharge the surety, although the principal afterwards becomes insolvent, unless, accompanying the request to proceed against the principal, there is an explicit notice that, in case the creditor shall fail to sue, the surety will hold himself discharged." Kennedy v. Falde, 4 Dak. 310, 20 N. W. 667.

We do not base this opinion solely upon the fact that defendant failed to notify the creditor that he would "hold himself discharged if it failed to proceed against the principal," but cite the rule simply for the purpose of showing the extent to which some authorities go, the strictness to which the surety is held to bring himself within the rule to obtain exoneration from liability. It is well settled that a simple request to proceed against the principal is not sufficient. In the case of Kennedy v. Falde, supra, the language of the surety to the creditor was, "You had better collect the sum from Mr. Falde." Perhaps not quite as strong as the language used in this case, but in speaking to that point the court says: "Can it be claimed that such language was a requirement made upon the principal to proceed and collect the sum from Falde, and, if he neglected so to do, the surety would consider himself released? Clearly not. To require is 'to demand; to insist upon having; to claim as by right and authority; to exact; to claim as indispensable,'—a synonym, as we understand its use in this section, for 'exact; direct; order.'"

"If all the other modes provided by law for the protection of a surety are by him to be disregarded, no action upon his part, under the provisions of § 1681 [Dakota, same as § 1058, Okla. Rev. Laws 1910], will be deemed a compliance with its provision, which falls short of a clear notice to the creditor that he expects and requires him to proceed in collection of the debt against the principal. Such a demand must be made that the creditor should understand that the wish and direction of the surety to him is to proceed against the principal in the collection of the debt. No requirement susceptible of any other construction will be sufficient. Applying this rule to the language used in the case at bar, it will be seen it falls far short of such a 'requirement' as is contemplated by statute."

It is definitely settled by the common law, as well as numerous decisions in this state, based upon statutory enactments, that "the general liability of a surety upon a note, account, or bond is not conditioned upon the exercise of diligence by the holder of the obligation to collect of the principal, and the negligence or passive inactivity of such holder is not a defense available to the surety."

It is also held by numerous authorities that notice of the surety to an agent or attorney of the creditor would not suffice unless the authority of such agent or attorney is made to appear by the evidence. Cummins v. Garretson, 15 Ark. 132; Driakill v. Washington County, 53 Ind. 532; Sapington v. Jeffries, 15 Mo. 628; Adams v. Roane, 7 Ark. 360; Bartlett v. Cunningham, 85 Ill. 22; Shimer v. Jones, 47 Pa. 268; Hellen v. Bryson, 40 Pa. 472.

Measuring the instruction of the trial court now under consideration by the foregoing rules, it must be apparent to all that it cannot be approved, and that prejudicial error was committed by the court in so instructing the jury.

The recent decisions of this court clearly settled the doctrine in this state upon the questions under consideration here, in favor of the contentions of plaintiff in error. In the case of Palmer v. Noe, 48 Okla. 450, 150 Pac. 464, the court says:

"Section 1056, Rev. Laws 1910, provides when sureties may be exonerated, and this section is as follows: 'A surety is exonerated: First, in like manner with a guarantor; second, to the extent to which he is prejudiced by an act of the creditor which would naturally prove injurious to the remedies of the surety or inconsistent with his rights, or which lessens his security; or, third, to the extent to which he is prejudiced by an omission of the creditor to do anything, when required by the surety, which it is his duty to do.'

"Section 1058, Rev. Laws 1910, provides that a surety may require the creditor to proceed against the principal, under certain conditions. This section is as follows: 'A surety may require his creditor to proceed against the principal, or to pursue any other remedy in his power which the surety cannot himself pursue, and which would lighten his burden; and if in such case the creditor neglects to do so, the surety is exonerated to the extent to which he is thereby prejudiced.'

"The defendant insists that, under § 1058 and subdivisions 2 and 3 of § 1056, he is released from liability upon the note sued on, for the reason that the plaintiff failed to comply with the oral request made to his attorney to proceed against the principal and sureties upon said note at a time when the principal was solvent and amply able to pay the debtor, and that in the meantime the principal and the other sureties became insolvent, and that his failure to so proceed prejudiced his rights and remedies against the principal and his cosureties. With this contention we cannot agree. It was not the duty of the plaintiff to sue the principal, and, not being his duty, his failure to do so was not prejudicial to the rights and remedies of the defendant. The defendant obligated himself to pay the debt, and, upon the failure of the principal to pay it, at maturity, it was his duty to pay it and proceed against the principal and his cosureties under § 1061, Rev. Laws 1910.

"Plaintiff had the option to sue any or all of the makers of this note, and, having this option, his failure to comply with the oral request of the defendant would not operate as a release of liability. If, as a matter of fact, the principal and the other sureties thereon were solvent, it was the plain duty of the defendant to pay the obligation and proceed to protect himself under the statute."

Later in a similar case, Miller v. State, — Okla. —, 152 Pac. 410, this court adopted and approved the doctrine in Palmer v. Noe, supra, in the following language:

"On the merits, the question presented in this case cannot be distinguished from Palmer v. Noe, supra: 'Under § 4694, Rev. Laws 1910, the payee of a promissory note may, at his option, sue one of the sureties, without joining the maker and the other sureties as parties defendant; and his failure to sue the maker and other sureties does not operate as a release of the surety sued. The failure of the payee of a promissory note to sue the principal, upon the oral request of the surety sued, made long after the maturity of the note to the attorney of the payee, who had the note for collection, does not operate as a release of the surety sued, even though the principal, at the time the request was made, was solvent and amply able to pay the note, and in the meantime he and the other sureties thereon became insolvent; it being the duty of the surety, upon the failure of the principal to pay the note when due, to pay the same, and pursue his remedy against the principal and his cosureties.'

"Counsel for the plaintiff in error has earnestly requested us, in a well-considered brief, to reconsider the question decided in that case and overrule it. But, after a careful consideration of the authorities, we are satisfied that that case was rightly decided, and in addition the importance of adhering to the decisions of this court once made, and thus preserving a conformity in the law, cannot be overestimated."

Other questions are presented in this case, but we deem it unnecessary to discuss them. The section under which the defense is made came from Dakota, and was adopted here in early territorial days. The case of Kennedy v. Falde, supra, was decided by that court long before the section was adopted here, and became a part of the law of this state. That construction has been approved and consistently followed by numerous decisions in this court, and cited with approval by a number of the courts of last resort in sister states.

The case should be reversed and remanded to the District Court of Washita County, with instructions to render judgment for the plaintiff for the full amount of the note sued on, in accordance with the terms and provisions of said note.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ALBERT SIMS et al., Appts.,

v.

J. M. EVERETT et al.

(113 Ark. 198, 168 S. W. 559.)

Appeal — from directed verdict — question open.

1. The only question open upon appeal from a directed verdict, when each party requested such verdict in his favor, is the legal sufficiency of the evidence to support it.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, VII. c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Bills and notes — consideration for assignment — right to question.

2. The sureties on a note cannot, in an action by the assignee, question the consideration for an assignment of the note if it is in writing.

For other cases, see Bills and Notes, V. a, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — noncompliance with a parol request to sue — effect.

3. Failure of the holder to comply with a parol request of a surety on a note for suit against the maker does not release the surety, where the statute provides for such release on failure to comply with a request in writing.

(June 1, 1914.)

Note. — For failure to comply with surety's demand or request to proceed in the enforcement of the obligation, see annotation following this case, post, 10. L.R.A.1918C.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Independence County in defendant's favor in an action to recover the amount alleged to be due on two promissory notes. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Samuel M. Casey, for appellants:

A notice to sue by one of the two sureties does not discharge the other one, who did not give notice.

Wilson v. Tebbetts, 29 Ark. 579, 21 Am. Rep. 165.

Even if the defendants gave the holder of the notes, Edmondson, notice to sue on them, still this falls far short of entitling them to a verdict, for the reason that they must go further and show that at the time they gave this notice the principal was solvent, and that he has since become insolvent.

Hempstead v. Watkins, 6 Ark. 353, 42 Am. Dec. 696; Thompson v. Robinson, 34 Ark. 44; King v. Haynes, 35 Ark. 463.

The maker of a note cannot question the authority or capacity of the payee to make a transfer thereof.

Winer v. Bank of Blytheville, 89 Ark. 444, 131 Am. St. Rep. 102, 117 S. W. 232.

Mr. Dene H. Coleman for appellees.

McCulloch, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover from appellees, J. M. Everett and W. A. Halliburton, the amount of two negotiable promissory notes executed by them as sureties for J. T. Halliburton to O. B. Edmondson, now deceased. Edmondson, by written indorsement on the back of each of the notes, assigned the same to the Union Bank & Trust Company, and the latter in turn assigned same to appellant Albert Sims, who instituted this action; but subsequent to its institution said Union Bank & Trust Company, as the executor of Edmondson's estate (he having died), was joined as plaintiff. The case originated before a justice of the peace, and there are no written pleadings; but the two appellees, as sureties, defended on the ground that they requested the payee of the note to sue and that he failed to do so, and by reason thereof the principal had become insolvent so that his liability could not be enforced. The only evidence tending to support that defense, if it be held to be a good defense, is that of witness Christopher, who stated that he heard a conversation between Edmondson and one of the sureties, in which the latter told Edmondson "to collect his money, that it was due, and that he didn't want to have to pay it." The only testimony which it is claimed tended to establish the solvency of the principal debtor at or about the time the request was made was that of a witness who stated that he heard a conversation between Edmondson and the principal debtor, in which the latter said that if required he would sell his wagon and team to pay the notes, and that Edmondson told him that he did not want him to do so, as the sureties on the notes were good. The court was requested by the parties on both sides of the controversy to give a peremptory instruction, and the court refused to grant appellant's request, but instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of appellees, the defendants.

The case therefore stands here as if the jury had, upon correct instructions, returned a verdict in appellees' favor, and the sole question is that of the legal sufficiency of the evidence. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Mulkey, 100 Ark. 71, 139 S. W. 643, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1339.

There was testimony tending to qualify the interest of appellant Sims in the notes, and to show that the original payee had an interest therein; but, inasmuch as there was a valid assignment in writing, he was authorized to sue, and appellees cannot question the consideration upon which the assignment is based. Moreover, the executor of the original holder is made party, and that eliminates any question of the relative interests of the parties in the recovery.

The statutes of this state provide that "any person bound as surety for another in any bond, bill, or note, . . . may, at any time after action hath accrued thereon, by notice in writing, require the person having such right of action forthwith to commence suit against the principal debtor." And that "if such suit be not commenced within thirty days after the service of such notice, and proceeded in with due diligence, in the ordinary course of law, to judgment and execution, such surety shall be exonerated from liability to the person notified." Kirby's Dig. §§ 7921, 7922.

It is not shown that the terms of the statute were complied with, but it is contended that noncompliance with the verbal request was sufficient to exonerate the sureties, if the principal was solvent at the time the request was made and afterward became insolvent. The trial court evidently based the decision upon that view of the law.

It is said that the law has been so declared in three of the decisions of this court. Hempstead v. Watkins, 6 Ark. 317, 42 Am. Dec. 696; Thompson v. Robinson, 34 Ark. 44; King v. Haynes, 35 Ark. 463. There are statements to that effect in the opinions in the two cases last cited, but in each case it was mere dictum, for the reason that the point was not involved and the court did not decide it. The case of Hempstead v. Watkins, supra, was cited in each of those cases as supporting the statement; but the point was not decided in that case. In the case last referred to notice had been given in the manner provided by statute, but had not been complied with; the suit brought within the time specified in the statute having been instituted by the plaintiff in the wrong capacity. After the expiration of the statutory time for complying with the notice, another suit was instituted, and judgment was rendered against the principal and sureties; and subsequently the sureties filed a bill in the chancery court to restrain the enforcement of said judgment against them. The point of the case was whether or not the sureties had any remedy in a court of equity which was not barred by the judgment at law, and the court decided that the judgment at law did not bar the sureties of their equitable remedies, and that the chancery court had jurisdiction to grant relief to the sureties against the enforcement of said judgment, and, following the decision of the New York court in the case of Pain v. Packard, 13 Johns. 174, 7 Am. Dec. 369, said that "the statute is but declaratory, and an extension of an existing and originally equitable remedy, and which has been adopted and converted by courts of law into a subject of legal cognizance."

In Thompson v. Robinson, the surety requested the payee in the note to sue the principal debtor and attach the property of the principal, and, after judgment, instituted action in chancery to restrain the enforcement. The court held that no ground for relief was shown, for the reason that there appeared no ground for attachment of the property of the principal debtor. The court said that mere delay or neglect to sue, without notice, would not discharge the surety, but that "if, after the debt was due, the surety, verbally or in writing, request the creditor to sue the principal, who is then solvent, and the creditor fail to do so, and the principal afterwards becomes insolvent, the surety is thereby discharged."

King v. Haynes was a suit in equity to enjoin the enforcement of a judgment against a surety on the ground that the creditor had extended the time of payment without his consent; but this court held that there had been no extension for a definite period upon a valid consideration, and the surety was not discharged. Mr. Justice Eakin in the opinion of the court stated the rule announced in Hempstead v. Watkins, supra, but held that the proof was not sufficient to bring the case within that rule.

So it will be seen that in each of those cases the announcement of that rule was dictum. It is clearly against the great weight of authority, and we think it also inconsistent with other decisions of this court.

We have held that the statute on the subject is in derogation of the common law and of the contractual rights of the parties to such instrument, and should be strictly construed. Cummins v. Garretson, 15 Ark. 132; Thompson v. Treller, 82 Ark. 247, 101 S. W. 174.

An examination of the authorities discloses the fact that there was no such rule at the common law, and that in the absence of a statute the surety cannot compel the creditor to bring suit against the principal, and is not discharged by the failure of the principal to do so. Mr. Brandt calls attention to the few cases holding to the rule above announced, but says that it is contrary to the great weight of authority, and cites numerous cases in support of that statement. "The great majority of cases on the subject hold," he says, "in the absence of any statutory provision, that if, after the debt is due, the surety request the creditor to sue the principal, who is then solvent, and the creditor fails to do so, and the principal afterwards becomes insolvent, the surety is not thereby discharged. The ground upon which these decisions rest is that the principal and surety are both equally bound to the creditor, who may have taken a surety in order that he might not have to sue the principal. If the surety desires a suit brought against the principal, he may himself pay the debt and immediately sue the principal. The contrary doctrine is an innovation, and was unknown L.R.A.1918C.

to the common law." 1 Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 265.

The doctrine seems to have originated with the case of Pain v. Packard, supra, decided by the New York court of errors in 1816.

Chancellor Kent, in the case of King v. Baldwin, 2 Johns. Ch. 554, refused to follow the rule announced in Pain v. Packard, and on appeal the court of errors reversed his decision by a divided court; the deciding vote being cast by the lieutenant governor, who was a layman. The New York courts, in later decisions, have recognized the rule announced in Pain v. Packard, but almost invariably have done so with protest against its correctness. The case has been condemned by nearly all the courts which have had occasion to discuss the law on the subject.

Chief Justice Parker, speaking for the Massachusetts court in Frye v. Barker, 4 Pick. 382, said: "We never have adopted the law stated to be settled in the New York case of Pain v. Packard, that a surety may discharge himself, if upon request the creditor does not sue the principal. . . . The cases cited of a discharge to the surety, where the principal may still be holden, are chiefly cases of obligation to perform some duty other than the payment of money, where the terms of the contract are changed by the obligee without the consent of the surety. . . . There seems to be no reason in the case of money contracts, for discharging the surety because the promisee neglects to sue the principal, for the surety may pay the debt and then bring an action himself."

In the case of Inkster v. First Nat. Bank, 30 Mich. 143, Mr. Justice Christianity, speaking for the court, said: "The case of Pain v. Packard, 13 Johns. 174, 7 Am. Dec. 369 (which has been followed in New York not without some vigorous protest, and to some extent in some other states), was, we think, a clear departure from the common law; and we find nothing in the English decisions to warrant the qualifications of a surety's liabilities there recognized."

Many other decisions discuss the doctrine laid down in Pain v. Packard, and expressly decline to follow it, declaring it to be an innovation. Davis v. Huggins, 3 N. H. 231; Dame v. Corduan, 24 Cal. 157, 85 Am. Dec. 58; Langdon v. Markle, 48 Mo. 357; Hickok v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 35 Vt. 476; Jenkins v. Clarkson, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 72; Stout v. Ashton, 5 T. B. Mon. 251; Nichols v. McDowell, 14 B. Mon. 6; Gage v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 79 Ill. 62; Huff v. Sliffe, 25 Neb. 448, 13 Am. St. Rep. 497, 41 N. W. 289. Those cases hold, in effect, that in the absence of statute, the surety has no right to require the creditor to proceed against the principal, and that a failure to sue upon request does not discharge the surety. In Stout v. Ashton, 5 T. B. Mon. 251, where it was proved that the surety, who had requested the payee to sue the principal, insisted upon suit being brought, the court said: "We cannot concur with the court below by supposing the surety to be released by the mere laches or neglect of the obligee to bring suit. No case which has come under our notice goes that far. On the contrary, it is well settled that mere delay in bringing suit by the obligee, though urged to do so by the surety, does not discharge the surety, and for a good reason. The surety has undertaken positively to pay the debt. If his obligee will not sue, and he is in danger, he can relieve himself by fulfilling his obligation; that is, by paying his debt and taking the whip into his own hands and pursuing his principal."

In the other case cited above from the Kentucky court of appeals, it was said: "If he [referring to the surety] has an equitable right to require the creditor to sue and coerce the debt out of the principal, the extent of that right, and the manner in which he can avail himself of it, have been defined and prescribed by statute, and he cannot avail himself of it in any other mode." [14 B. Mon. 7.]

similar to ours, and the supreme court of that state, in the case above cited, said: "Since this statute was passed, the common-law rule has not been in force in this state; and it is unnecessary to inquire what its provisions are, for it has given place to the statute, and is repealed by it, if any such rule existed as that which would discharge a surety who gave the creditor notice to sue the principal by parol, if the creditor did not proceed accordingly. The statute of Ohio requires the notice to be in writing." [7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 74.]

We are convinced therefore that the dicta contained in the three decisions referred to in the beginning are erroneous, and should not be allowed to control in the decision of this case on the question presented. They are therefore disapproved, and the rule is announced that the statute on this subject controls, and unless complied with the surety is not discharged by mere inactivity on the part of the creditor or failure or refusal to sue the principal.

The question whether or not the creditor may waive the form of the notice and accept verbal notice is not raised in the present case, and it is left for decision in some case in which it is directly raised.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore reversed, and judgment will be entered here in favor of appellants for the amount of the notes sued on, with interest.

I. Introductory.

Apart from the effect of a request by the surety, it is undisputed that the holder of an obligation on which there is a surety owes the surety no duty of active diligence in enforcing the obligation after its maturity.<sup>1</sup> On the other hand, it seems to be quite well settled, at least it has been stated by a leading text-writer,<sup>2</sup> that sureties are entitled to come into equity after the debt has become due to compel the debtor to exonerate them from their liability by paying the debt. This principle has been recognized in cases coming within the scope of this note.<sup>3</sup> In fact, it has been held to be the right of a surety by application to a court of equity to compel the creditor to proceed in the collection of the claim.<sup>4</sup> A decree was rendered in one case to the effect that the creditor make demand upon the principal debtor, and upon his refusal to pay that he commence suit on the obligation or be barred from claiming any rights against the surety, upon the surety tendering a sufficient amount to pay reasonable costs and expenses.<sup>5</sup> It seems clear, therefore, that the surety may, by application to a court of equity at or after the maturity of the obligation, obtain relief. Whether the surety can, by a request or demand, impose upon the creditor the duty of enforcing the obligation, is the subject of investigation in this note. The fact that the surety may have relief in equity is by some courts considered a reason for not giving him the additional remedy to compel the creditor to sue by request;<sup>6</sup> while the court in King v. Baldwin<sup>7</sup> argues directly contrary.

II. Rule in the absence of statute.

a. Rule that surety is not relieved by failure of holder to sue after request.

In the absence of a statute regulating the subject, the rule sustained in a majority of jurisdictions is that a creditor is under no obligation to take active steps to enforce the instrument even though he has been requested to do so by the surety; and therefore his failure to proceed to collect the instrument after notice by the surety does not release the surety.<sup>8</sup> That a failure to pro-

This is the theory of Bull v. Allen (1848) 19 Conn. 101, in which the surety had signed as a joint obligor with the debtor, and was treated as a joint debtor, so far at least as the payee of the note was concerned; and it is stated that nothing would operate as a defense to the note for one of the joint obligors which would not also be a defense for the other.

In Stout v. Ashton (1827) 5 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 251, the surety claimed to be released because he had insisted on the holder of the note pursuing the principal by suit, and the holder had failed to do so, but had permitted him to leave the state openly and with his knowledge. It was further claimed that the principal debtor was then solvent and at the time of trial wholly insolvent. The court does not discuss the effect of the request, but states simply that the creditor was under no duty of active diligence, and therefore the surety was not released.

The failure of a bank to cause the arrest of a defaulting clerk upon the request of a surety on his bond was held not to release the surety, in Louisiana State Bank v. Ledoux (1848) 3 La. Ann. 674.

It was admitted in Hickok v. Farmers' & M. Bank (1862) 35 Vt. 476, that ordinarily a request of the surety does not obligate the creditor to sue the principal debtor, but it was claimed that in that case there were circumstances which should entitle the surety to relief. These were that the surety resided out of the state; that the bankruptcy of the principal debtor was imminent, and his personal property was known and easily attachable, and there would have been no expense to the creditor; that the surety's counsel was ready to see that it was faithfully done, and that the surety himself was then embarrassed so that he could not pay the note. The right of the surety to relief under such circumstances was denied however, it being stated that these circumstances do not furnish any sufficient ground for making an exception to the general rule.

principal debtor was solvent at the time of such notice and afterwards became insolvent.<sup>9</sup> And this is true although

In National Bank v. Gilvin (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 152 S. W. 652, an action upon a promissory note, where a surety claimed to be relieved because of the failure of the creditor to sue at the first term of court after maturity, the court, in denying this defense, states that no obligation rested on the creditor to sue at the first term of court, "no statutory notice having been pleaded." And further in the opinion the court states that the rule which seems to prevail in the great majority of states is "that the surety cannot accelerate the action of a dilatory creditor by notice to proceed against the principal, unless there is express statutory authority to that end."

The sureties on the bond of a deputy sheriff are not relieved from liability thereon by failure of the sheriff to whom the bond was given to comply with the request of the sureties to remove the deputy from office or otherwise discharge them from future liability on the bond, since he had become incompetent, negligent, and unfit for the office, and they were unwilling longer to be accountable for his conduct as a deputy sheriff, even though the sheriff promised them that he would remove the deputy in a reasonable time. Crane v. Newell (1824) 2 Pick. (Mass.) 612, 13 Am. Dec. 461. The court refers to the doctrine of Pain v. Packard (1816) 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 174, 7 Am. Dec. 369, and King v. Baldwin (1819) 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 384, 8 Am. Dec. 415, and disapproves the same.

The court in Bizzell v. Smith (1831) 17 N. C. (2 Dev. Eq.) 27, expresses an opinion in accord with these views, but leaves the point undecided, and holds that the surety did not show that he had been prejudiced, since it appeared that the principal debtor was insolvent at the time the obligation was given, and much more so when the notice to bring suit was given, and therefore the surety could not complain of the failure of the creditor to bring suit as requested.

This is the rule approved in Hartman v. Burlingame (1858) 9 Cal. 557, where there was no sufficient showing of insolvency occurring after notice.

<sup>9</sup> Taylor v. Beck (1851) 13 Ill. 376; Nichols v. McDowell (1853) 14 B. Mon. (Ky.) 6 (but the court here concludes by stating that, if the surety has an equitable right to require creditor to sue, the extent of that right, and the manner in which the surety can avail himself of it, are defined by statute, and he cannot avail himself of it in any other mode); Inkster v. First Nat. Bank (1874) 30 Mich. 143 (this is true even though the surety adds the word "surety" to his signature), approved in Michigan State Ins. Co. v. Soule (1883) 51 Mich. 312, 16 N. W. 662; Smith v. Freyler (1882) 4 Mont. 489, 47 Am. Rep. 358, 1

the creditor brought a suit upon notice which he afterwards discontinued.<sup>10</sup> The creditor is not bound to active diligence against the debtor, and the surety cannot compel this by requesting that the creditor proceed to collect his debt; the surety can pay the debt at maturity and immediately resort to the debtor for reimbursement.

The fact alluded to in the introduction, that the surety may resort to equity to obtain relief, is viewed by the courts following the rule now under consideration as a reason against allowing the surety to impose upon the creditor the duty of active diligence by a request.<sup>11</sup> In Minnesota, where a statute gave to the surety the right to bring an action against the creditor and principal debtor to compel payment, the equitable rule relieving the surety upon failure of the creditor to sue upon notice was held not applicable.<sup>12</sup>

That the surety is not relieved by the creditor's failure to sue upon request has been held true although the creditor, upon being notified to sue, tells the surety that part of the note has been paid, that arrangements have been made with the debtor for the balance, and that the creditor will not call on the surety for the note.<sup>13</sup>

It has been held, however, in case a creditor, upon notice from the surety to collect the debt of the principal debtor, promises the surety to look solely to the principal debtor, and the surety by reason of such assurance fails to protect himself, that an estoppel arises to the extent of any loss suffered by the surety.<sup>14</sup> The estoppel arises in such a case from the failure to comply with the promise, and it has been held that no estoppel arises from the failure of a bank to apply the general deposit account of a depositor upon a note of his held by it upon a mere verbal request or demand of the surety that this should be done, where the surety knew that the bank did not intend to comply with his demand.<sup>15</sup> The effect of a promise, however, whether made with or without a request to sue, has been excluded from this note.

In some cases it is held that a refusal of the creditor to sue upon the request of the surety unaccompanied by an offer of indemnity against the costs and charges of the suit does not furnish a defense at law against the suit of the Duval* (1801) 3 Call (Va.) 69; Dennis v. Rider (1841) 2 McLean, 451, Fed. Cas. No. 3,797.

This is stated, in Wilds v. Attix (1866) 4 Del. Ch. 253, to be the settled law. In that case there was a further equity arising out of the fact that the creditor failed to comply with his promise to proceed, made to the surety when the surety made the request. The surety was held not to have altered his condition by waiving some protection or remedy which he would otherwise have secured, and therefore could not urge this as a release.

In the contention of the surety in Dane v. Corduan (1864) 24 Cal. 157, 85 Am. Dec. 53, it is stated that the debtor was solvent at the time of notice and afterwards became insolvent, but the court says nothing about insolvency.

In Triplet v. Randolph (1891) 46 Mo. App. 569, it is held that if a creditor, knowing that one of his debtors is a surety for the other and that such surety is about to give him legal notice to bring suit, by his conduct, prevents the notice from being given, which, if given and acted upon, would have caused the bringing of the suit and the collection of the note, the surety is discharged, where the principal has become insolvent so that the note cannot be collected from him.

creditor, notwithstanding the principal may have become insolvent.<sup>16</sup> An offer of indemnity will not under this theory obligate the creditor to sue in all cases.<sup>17</sup>

b. Rule that surety is relieved by failure of holder to sue after request.

A rule supported in some jurisdictions even in the absence of statute, is that it is the duty of the creditor, upon receiving notice at or after maturity to proceed in the collection of the obligation, and his failure to do so discharges the surety if, at the time of the notice, the principal debtor is solvent and afterward becomes insolvent so that the debt cannot be collected of him; in other words, the surety must suffer some injury from the delay.<sup>18</sup> This doctrine

<sup>16</sup> Bellows v. Lovell (1827) 5 Pick. (Mass.) 307. See Huey v. Pinney, infra, note 25. A mere verbal promise of the surety to furnish such a bond is held in Eaton v. Waite (1877) 66 Me. 221, not sufficient to require the creditor to proceed.

<sup>17</sup> In Adams Bank v. Anthony (1836) 18 Pick. (Mass.) 238, a creditor who held two notes of the same person brought a suit against the debtor and attached property more than sufficient to cover both notes. He did not intend to sue on the note on which there was a surety. Subsequently, other creditors attached the property in question, and the creditor did not take judgment on the note on which there was a surety. The surety contended that upon his request the creditor was bound to include the amount of this note in the judgment, and that because he refused to do so the surety was exonerated from his liability. The court, however, held otherwise, stating that the introduction of this note into the judgment of this creditor would have been a fraud upon the after-attaching creditors which would have avoided the creditor's own attachment; that the offer of indemnity by the surety did not in the slightest degree vary the legal or moral obligations and duties of the creditor.

The principle of Hancock v. Bryant (1829) 2 Yerg. (Tenn.) 476, and Thompson v. Watson (1837) 10 Yerg. (Tenn.) 362, supra, is stated, in Burrow v. Bank of Tennessee (1846) 6 Humph. (Tenn.) 440, to go "to the verge of the law."

The court in Pennsylvania at first declined to express an opinion as to whether the surety would be released, if it should appear that the insolvency of the debtor would have prevented the collection of the debt from him, if suit had been brought against him when notice was given. Cope v. Smith (1822) 8 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 110, 11 Am. Dec. 582. The notice to sue being held insufficient, the surety was held not released. Subsequently, however, this court expressed an opinion that the surety would not be released unless he could show that he had been injured through the debtor becoming insolvent after notice so that the opportunity to collect the debt from him had been lost. Gardner v. Ferree (1826) 15 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 28, 16 Am. Dec. 513.

In Manchester Iron Mfg. Co. v. Sweeting (1833) 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 162, it is stated that the failure of the creditor to prosecute the principal on the request of the surety was virtually an agreement to discharge the surety and look to the responsibility of the principal alone.

It is stated in De Caumont v. Rasines (1890) 38 App. Div. 153, 56 N. Y. Supp. 652, that "to sustain the defense that a creditor, as between a surety and the principal debtor, must resort first to the property of the principal debtor, two things are necessary,—a request by the surety to the creditor so to proceed, and a failure to comply therewith with resultant damages."

See State use of Snell v. Reynolds (1832) 3 Mo. 95, infra, note 98.

See other cases which in theory support the rule, but hold that the surety is not discharged because of insufficiency of the notice, infra, II, b, 2.

Whatever may have been held in Dehuff was announced in Pain v. Packard,<sup>19</sup> and at first met with considerable opposition from the courts of New York,<sup>20</sup> and it has been expressly disapproved in a number of the jurisdictions holding to the opposite rule, as discussed supra. It was finally firmly established in New York by the decision in King v. Baldwin.<sup>21</sup> In the latter case Spencer, Ch. J., calls attention to the right of a surety to go into equity and compel the creditor to obtain payment of the principal debtor.<sup>22</sup> From this he reasons that there is a duty owing from the creditor to obtain payment of the debt from the principal debtor in the first instance if that is possible, and continues thus: "If this duty exists, and does bind the conscience of the creditor, I cannot conceive why it may not be brought into exercise by an act in pais, and without the interposition of a court of equity." In Pennsylvania, where there is no court of chancery, the court, in adhering to this theory, argues that unless a request in pais is sufficient the equity of the surety to have the obligation enforced against the principal debtor is sacrificed.<sup>23</sup>

v. Turbett (1801) 3 Yeates (Pa.) 157, the rule relieving the surety upon failure of the creditor to sue upon notice is now established in Pennsylvania.

This is the theory upon which Hempstead v. Watkins (1845) 6 Ark. 317, 42 Am. Dec. 696; Thompson v. Robinson (1879) 34 Ark. 44; and Kendall v. Milligan (1896) 62 Ark. 629, 34 S. W. 78, were decided, but this can no longer be regarded as the law in this jurisdiction since the decision in Stims v. EVERETT, ante, 7.

The South Carolina cases are on both sides of the question. The doctrine of Pain v. Packard was expressly disapproved in Caston v. Dunlap (1831) Rich. Eq. Cas. (S. C.) 77, 23 Am. Dec. 194, and Pickett v. Land (1831) 2 Bail. L. (S. C.) 608, supra. It was the theory of the early South Carolina case of Butler v. Hamilton (1804) 2 Desauss. Eq. (S. C.) 226, 2 Am. Dec. 692, as interpreted in the subsequent case of Rutledge v. Greenwood (1806) 2 Desauss. Eq. (S. C.) 389, "that equity will give relief to a surety where the obligee has not used due diligence to recover his debt from the principal in the first instance, and has refused or neglected to comply with the surety's request to use that diligence." Relief was denied the surety in Butler v. Hamilton for the reason that the creditor had proceeded against the principal debtor on one of the obligations involved, and process was found unavailing, this fact, proving, in the opinion of the court, that he was in no situation to pay, and therefore it was not necessary to proceed on the other obligations involved. In Rutledge v. Greenwood relief was denied the surety on the theory that, the suretyship not appearing on the face of the instrument and the surety failing to prove to the satisfaction of the court that he was such, he was not entitled to relief. Upon the rehearing of Rutledge v. Greenwood the court assumed the suretyship, but it being shown that the surety waited for five years and four months after the creditor had a right to demand the payment of the debt before he required the obligee to sue, was held guilty of laches, and therefore not entitled to the relief sought. As a further reason for denying relief to the surety in Rutledge v. Greenwood, it was shown that, when notice was given to the creditor, he proposed to put the obligation in suit against all the obligors; that the surety declined this proposition, and requested that the suit be brought against the principal debtor alone. These decisions were previous to the decision in Pain v. Packard. In the subsequent case of Lang v. Brevard (1849) 3 Strobb. Eq. (S. C.) 59, the South Carolina court refers to the doctrine of Pain v. Packard and King v. Baldwin, and states that it has never been judicially recognized by the courts of the state, nor is it necessary to decide the question in the case at bar; but the court continues: "I am authorized to say that a majority of this court are prepared to adopt the principle of this decision, and to extend similar relief to a surety under the like circumstances."

Baldwin*, to the fact that King v. Baldwin was decided by the casting vote of the presiding officer of the court of errors, who was a layman.

<sup>22</sup> This rule is also regarded as a settled rule in Hayes v. Ward (1819) 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 123, 8 Am. Dec. 554. And see supra, notes 2 et seq.

<sup>23</sup> Cope v. Smith (1822) 8 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 110, 11 Am. Dec. 582. It is stated that in Pennsylvania the court holds itself bound to administer equity in all cases where the forms of law do not restrain it. The notice given in this case, however, was decided to be insufficient, and therefore the surety was not released.

In Erie Bank v. Gibson (1832) 1 Watts (Pa.) 143, the court states: "I am reconciled to the rule by the fact that we have no court of chancery; for if we had one I would compel the surety to seek his remedy there."

the principal debtor has been held sufficient without a tender of expenses, or a stipulation to pay them, or an offer by the surety to take the obligation and bring suit himself, unless the creditor at the time of notice expressly puts his refusal to sue on the ground of the trouble and expense, and offers to proceed if that objection is removed.<sup>24</sup> On the other hand, the supreme court of Minnesota, while approving the equitable doctrine, has stated that the surety is not relieved by the failure of the creditor to sue upon notice, unless the surety has tendered the creditor indemnity against expenses.<sup>25</sup> The Minnesota court, while approving the equitable rule releasing the surety for failure of the creditor to sue upon notice, holds that it will not be applied because of a statute in that state providing that an action may be brought by one person against two or more persons for the purpose of compelling one to satisfy a debt due the other for which the plaintiff is bound as surety, the theory being that, if the surety had the power in his own hands to sue the maker and holder of the notes to compel the maker to pay the holder, he should have exercised this right, and not demanded that the holder do so for him.<sup>26</sup>

If the creditor, at the time of notice, offers to permit the surety to use the bond in any way he may think beneficial to him, and the surety refuses to accept, he cannot complain of the failure of the creditor to sue.<sup>27</sup>

It has been held not necessary for the suretyship to appear on the face of the instrument to bring the equitable rule into operation.<sup>28</sup>

As stated supra, it is a condition of this rule that the debtor be solvent at the time of notice, and that he afterwards become insolvent. If he is not solvent at such time, the surety is not relieved by failure of the creditor to sue.<sup>29</sup> In other words, a release under this rule is based upon the fact that the surety has been injured by the failure of the creditor to sue after notice. Hence, if there is no injury to the surety, he is not relieved.<sup>30</sup>

As the New York court recognizes that the surety has a remedy, at least an equitable remedy, to compel payment by the principal debtor, the reasoning of the Minnesota court would seem to require that the surety be not granted the right to compel the creditor to sue by a request.

<sup>27</sup> Gardner v. Ferree (1826) 15 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 28, 16 Am. Dec. 513. It is stated that nothing more can be required than to invest the surety with the means in the power of the obligee to enforce the obligation.

The creditor cannot be compelled to pursue an insolvent principal. Merritt v. Lincoln (1855) 21 Barb. (N. Y.) 249.

It does not appear in any of these cases that the principal debtor became solvent after notice, so that the rule in such a situation is not declared. In fact, it affirmatively appears in most of them that the debtor remained insolvent. The rule is stated in these cases as in the text, that if the debtor was not solvent at the time of notice, the surety cannot claim to be released, no attention being given to his condition as to solvency thereafter. In Field v. Cutler (1871) 4 Lans. (N. Y.) 195, the rule is stated to apply where the principal debtor was insolvent at time of notice and remained insolvent.

Five days after the notice took effect, in Weiler v. Hoch (1855) 25 Pa. 525, the debtor made an assignment for the benefit of creditors. It is stated that the delay in this case was not long enough to give the surety a defense, but even if it were he had no reason to complain of it, for before the judgment could have been revived the assignment took effect, and a scire facias would only have increased the burden which the surety doubtless deemed heavy enough already.

<sup>30</sup> In Herbert v. Hobbs (1830) 3 Stew. (Ala.) 9, the debtor died and the creditor was requested by the sureties to proceed against his administrator. It was thought at the time of notice that the estate was solvent, but a large claim was subsequently presented, which if successful would make

While the present note does not deal exhaustively with the burden of proof, it may be stated that it has been held that the burden of showing the solvency at the time of notice and the subsequent insolvency is on the surety.<sup>31</sup> Again, it has been stated that, to bring a case within the operation of the rule, it is necessary for the surety to show that the principal was solvent at the time he requested the creditor to proceed and collect his debt, and was within the jurisdiction of the state, and that the creditor, without any reasonable excuse, neglected or refused to proceed until the principal debtor became insolvent and unable to pay.<sup>32</sup>

By solvency, within the rule, is meant that the debtor is in such a condition that the demand may be collected out of his property by due course of law, and not merely that the debtor might have paid if hard pressed.<sup>33</sup> A charge sustained in one decision was that "the term 'solvent,' in law, meant that a man was able to pay all his debts from his

the estate insolvent. The administrator testified that, if the note had been sued on against him as early as was possible, it might possibly have been paid, but that this was doubtful; that the property of the estate had diminished in value by the fall of prices. These facts are not discussed, but the court concludes that the surety suffered no injury by the delay.

In Gayle v. Randle (1836) 4 Port. (Ala.) 232, it is stated that a plea which does not state that the debt has been lost by the negligence of the plaintiff through the insolvency of the debtor after notice, nor that the notice was in writing is bad.

Cummins v. Garretson (1864) 15 Ark. 132.

This is apparently what is meant by the court in Bates v. State Bank (1847) 7 Ark. 394, 46 Am. Dec. 293, where it is stated merely that, upon a defense set up by a surety that the creditor had failed to bring suit when requested, where the surety offered no evidence as to the solvency of the principal either before or after the institution of the suit, it is clear that the surety could not succeed upon the plea. Since the decision in SIMS v. EVERETT, ante, 7, it can no longer be rendered as the rule in this jurisdiction that the surety would be released at common law upon a showing of injury.

See Hartman v. Burlingame (1868) 9 Cal. 557, supra, note 8.

A guarantor of the payment of a bond secured by a mortgage, who had given notice to the mortgagee to enforce his mortgage, was held not released in Hunt v. Purdy (1880) 82 N. Y. 486, 37 Am. Rep. 587, where it was not shown that the mortgaged premises had depreciated in value after the notice was given.

In Hopkins v. Spurlock (1870) 2 Heisk. (Tenn.) 152, a surety on several notes due from the principal debtor notified the creditor to collect his debt from the principal, especially mentioning one of the notes. A sum of money was collected from the principal debtor and applied to some of the notes, including the one specifically mentioned in the letter. In a suit to enjoin the collection of one of the notes, an allegation of the creditor's failure to sue upon notice was made; the creditor answered by setting up the facts that a sum had been collected from the principal debtor and applied on some of the obligations, and that he was unable to collect any more after exhausting all remedies by law or otherwise, thus leaving the note in suit unpaid. This was held to be a sufficient answer to the plea of release by failure to sue.

To constitute a defense to the surety it is necessary for him to aver and prove "that the principal has become insolvent after notice given to sue him, and that the means of recovering the debt of him have been lost by the negligence of the plaintiff." Bruce v. Edwards (1827) 1 Stew. (Ala.) 11, 18 Am. Dec. 33.

In Marsh v. Duncel (1881) 25 Hun (N. Y.) 167, the term "insolvent" is stated to usually mean one whose estate is not sufficient to pay his debts, or one who is unable to pay all his debts from his own means. Again, it is stated that one is solvent who has property sufficient to pay all his debts and all his debts can be collected by legal process.

In Darby v. Bernier Nat. Bank (1893) 97 Ala. 643, 11 So. 881, a plea setting up a failure to sue was held bad at common law in that it did not appear therefrom that the principal "was then solvent in the sense that payment of the note could have been coerced by action, judgment, and execution against him." The court continues: "The principal may then have had 'ample means wherewith to pay said indebtedness' as averred in the plea, and yet an effort to enforce payment, for aught that is alleged, have been entirely abortive, so that the plea fails to show affirmatively that the defendant was prejudiced by plaintiff's omission to proceed against" the principal debtor.

In Hancock v. Bryant (1829) 2 Yerg. (Tenn.) 476, it is stated that the fact that the money might have been made out of the principal, had the creditor been prompt on receiving notice to sue, is made by the evidence even more probable, thus not requiring an absolute proof on this question.

own means, or that his property was in such a situation that all his debts might be collected out of it by legal process."<sup>34</sup>

The equitable right to require the creditor to proceed with the collection of the debt has been held not to extend to the right to require the creditor to proceed after judgment.<sup>35</sup>

If the principal debtor has effects in the state, the fact that he is out of the state does not excuse the creditor from bringing suit.<sup>36</sup>

This equitable rule is practically codified in some statutes which have been enacted on the subject.<sup>37</sup>

Availability of defense at law.

There is a disagreement among the authorities as to whether the defense of a release by failure of the creditor to sue after notice, and consequent injury, is available to the surety at law. According to the majority view, it is a defense at law.<sup>38</sup> But in some cases it has been held available only in equity, and not to be available as a defense to an action at law upon the note.<sup>39</sup> In a state in which there was a statute which was held cumulative to the equitable remedy, it was held that a surety can be discharged in a law court only by notice under the statute.<sup>40</sup>

Effect of failure to make defense at law upon jurisdiction of equity.

As just shown, the release of a surety by failure of the creditor to sue upon notice is, according to the majority view, a defense at law. But the failure of the surety to make this defense in an action at law on the instrument has been held not to prevent him from afterwards coming into equity to restrain the enforcement of a judgment against him.<sup>41</sup> Spencer, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion in King v. Baldwin,<sup>42</sup> states that the defense that a surety is released upon the failure of the creditor to bring suit against the principal debtor upon request from the surety, if the principal debtor was solvent at the time of the request and has since become insolvent, was not firmly established at the time of the decision in the court of law in that case, and this being true the acquiescence by the surety in the decision at the court of law did not preclude him from subsequently coming into equity with his defense. It is stated: "But if it be doubtful whether a court of law can take cognizance of the defense, and there exists no doubt of the jurisdiction of a court of equity, and if, in such a case, a defendant at law, under the influence of such doubt, omits to make his defense, or if he bring it forward and it be overruled, under the idea that it is not a defense at law, it is not granting a new trial for a court of equity to afford relief notwithstanding the trial at law."

On the contrary, it has been held that a failure to make the defense at law precludes the surety from obtaining relief in equity.<sup>43</sup>

Of course, where the view that the defense is not available at law prevails, the surety is entitled to relief in equity, although he has made no defense at law.<sup>44</sup>

2. Sufficiency of the notice.

(a) In general.

The sufficiency of the demand or notice under the statutes is discussed in III. b, 2, infra. While the sufficiency of the demand or notice under statute has been affected to a certain extent by the form of the statute, the general theory underlying the sufficiency of the notice is the same under the equitable rule as under the statutes, and reference is made to a subdivision dealing with the sufficiency under the statutes for further discussion of this question. No general rule can be formulated that will automatically determine the sufficiency of a notice. Some general statements, however, are found in the cases which serve as guides to that end. It has been stated that the notice must be certain as to time and terms, to release the surety where the debtor has subsequently become insolvent.<sup>45</sup> Again, it is stated that the notice to the creditor must be a clear and explicit request to take legal proceedings to collect the debt, or enforce the liability of the principal.<sup>46</sup> It should clearly inform the creditor that he is required to take proceedings in the courts to enforce his debt;<sup>47</sup> a defense of a release by the creditor's failure to sue after notice, in an action at law on the note, was held in Thompson v. Watson (1837) 10 Yerg. (Tenn.) 362, entitled to enjoin the enforcement of the judgment. At the time of the decision in Thompson v. Watson, it had not been established in this state that the surety could not make the defense at law. That doctrine was established by the decision in Rice v. Simpson (1872) 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 809.

In Miller v. Arnold (1879) 65 Ind. 489, the court, after expressing an opinion in accordance with the rule discussed supra, II. a, in general, that a verbal notice is insufficient, states that whether the notice is verbal or written it must be so clear and distinct that the meaning of the surety can be at once apprehended without explanation or argument, and it must be accompanied by an explicit declaration that unless suit is brought the surety will no longer remain liable. It is then stated that no such notice was given in that case, and it is not necessary that any opinion should be expressed as to its materiality.

A notice by the agent of a surety to the creditor, stating that his principal was the surety of the debtor upon the note, and demanding that suit be brought upon it against the parties thereto, is a sufficient common-law notice. It is stated that it would have been a sufficient statutory notice, had it been in writing. Pickens v. Yarborough (1855) 26 Ala. 417, 62 Am. Dec. 728.

Valentine v. Farrington (1833) 2 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 53.

It is stated obiter, in Fulton v. Matthews (1818) 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 433, 8 Am. Dec. 261, that the holder of a note ought to be fairly and fully apprised by the surety that he is required to prosecute the principal. And in an obiter statement in Goodwin v. Simonson (1878) 74 N. Y. 133, it is stated that it must be shown that the creditor was requested to enforce the collection of the debt "by due process of law."

A statement made to a member of the law department of a corporation, who had nothing to do with the finance committee, which had charge of mortgages, that the surety on a note secured by mortgage desired the mortgage foreclosed if there were any taxes or assessments unpaid and in arrears upon the premises, has been held not to amount to a full and explicit request to the corporation to foreclose the mortgage. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Davies (1878) 56 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 440.

In Burrow v. Bank of Tennessee (1846) 6 Humph. (Tenn.) 440, the court, in holding the notice insufficient, states that it was not distinctly or satisfactorily established by the testimony.

<sup>47</sup> Hunt v. Purdy (1880) 82 N. Y. 486, 37 Am. Rep. 587. Within this rule a notice given by the guarantor of the payment of a mortgage and the accompanying bond before the maturity thereof (but apparently after a default in the payment of interest, upon which the principal became due at the option of the holder), to the creditor to "collect that mortgage in the spring; do not let it run over the time it is due," is not such a notice as calls upon the creditor to enforce his debt at the risk of releasing the guarantor.

A statement by the surety to the creditor that she "must push Jacob (the principal debtor), and keep pushing him," is not a sufficient notice to prosecute within this rule, unless the creditor understood the words as a request in fact to prosecute the principal debtor or to collect the note, and the defendant meant and intended this construction of the words. Singer v. Troutman (1867) 49 Barb. (N. Y.) 182.

Denick v. Hubbard (1882) 27 Hun (N. Y.) 347.

A statement made in a conversation between one surety and the attorney for the holder of the note, who had the note for collection, that "by request of [the other sureties] I came here, and would urge the collection of the note," is not such a notice as to require the holder of the note to proceed with reasonable diligence to enforce by suit his remedy against the maker. Coykendall v. Constable (1888) 48 Hun, mere expression of a wish or desire is not sufficient.<sup>48</sup>

It was stated in an early case in Pennsylvania that the notice must be proved clearly and beyond all doubt; it must be positive and accompanied with a declaration that, unless it be complied with, the surety will be considered as discharged.<sup>49</sup> The rule so stated has since been followed in that state.<sup>50</sup> Consequently, if it is not a positive request to sue, it is insufficient.<sup>51</sup> Likewise, a notice which does not state that unless suit is brought the surety will consider himself discharged is insufficient.<sup>52</sup>

(b) Verbal notice.

A verbal notice is sufficient under the 360, 1 N. Y. Supp. 9, affirmed in (1889) 117 N. Y. 627, 22 N. E. 1128.

A notice by the surety to the holder of the note, that "you must make Daniel come to time this fall; you know it is the best time for making money with farmers," is not a sufficient notice to release the surety because of the failure of the holder to take the requisite proceedings to enforce the note. Lawson v. Buckley (1888) 49 Hun, 329, 2 N. Y. Supp. 178. It is further stated here that the holder of the note, to satisfy the surety, replied that he would see the principal debtor about the note and see what he had been trying to do. This reply is stated not to indicate that the request of the surety implied that legal proceedings were to be taken.

A statement by the surety to the holder of a note, to "go and get your money, there is enough to pay you," is not a sufficient notice to the holder to sue. Maier v. Canavan (1879) 57 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 504, 8 Daly, 272.

See Kennedy v. Falde (1886) 4 Dak. 319, 29 N. W. 667, infra, note 115.

<sup>48</sup> A wish expressed by the surety to the holder of a note, viz., "I want it settled, and told Mr. Bowling [the holder] plainly that I wanted it settled," is not a sufficient notice to the holder to proceed and collect the note, under the common-law rule that the failure of the holder of a note to collect the same after notice given after maturity of the obligation discharges the surety, where the debtor has in the meantime become insolvent. Bowling v. Chambers (1904) 20 Colo. App. 113, 77 Pac. 16.

<sup>49</sup> Cope v. Smith (1822) 8 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 110, 11 Am. Dec. 582. Within this rule a statement made to the creditor that he should call on the principal debtor and demand or ask the money is insufficient.

<sup>50</sup> A notice by the surety to the creditor "to push Andrew [the principal debtor] or give him clear," stating that the surety would pay nothing, is stated in Wilson v. Glover (1846) 3 Pa. St. 404, not to comply with the rule of law on this subject; but this case turned on another point.

A notice which is definite as to the note to which it applies, and which is not clearly proved, is insufficient. Wolleshlare v. Searles (1863) 45 Pa. 45.

So it was stated in Shimer v. Jones (1864) 47 Pa. 268, approving Wolleshlare v. Searles, that the notice must be clear and distinct, so that its meaning will strike the mind of the hearer at once and without argument. L.R.A.1918C.

Notice by a surety to the creditor to collect the note, as he would not stand bail any longer, is a sufficient notice. It is stated that notice to collect is notice to sue, if suit be necessary for collection. It is further stated here that an effort to collect is not necessarily a suit, and it may be doubted whether a mere notice to make an effort amounts to anything. Strickler v. Burkholder (1864) 47 Pa. 476.

A notice by the surety for a tenant to "push for the rent as soon as it was due, that he wanted out of it," is stated in Fidler v. Hershey (1879) 90 Pa. 363, not to be a sufficient notice.

It is stated Donough v. Boger (1874) 10 Phila. (Pa.) 616, that nothing less than clear and positive proof of a notice given by persons duly authorized to give it, and a notice clear and explicit in its terms, given at a time when the creditor had it in his power to proceed to collect the debt, should discharge the surety from an undoubted legal obligation to pay the debt.

The letter set forth in Erie Bank v. Gibson, infra, note 52, is stated by the court to contain a sufficient notice to bring suit.

<sup>51</sup> Greenawalt v. Kreider (1846) 3 Pa. St. 264, 45 Am. Dec. 639. The notice here was as follows: "Please take notice that you hold a bond against Benjamin Stees for $1,000, in which Charles Greenawalt and myself are bail. I therefore notify you that I will be no longer considered bail. Please to take another bond from him, or payment." It is stated that there is no request to sue in this notice, that the request to take payment might perhaps be taken for a hint to push for the money, but, according to the plain rule laid down for all cases, a hint is not enough; it requires an explicit direction to sue.

<sup>52</sup> Erie Bank v. Gibson (1832) 1 Watts (Pa.) 143. The notice relied upon was contained in a letter written by the surety to the creditor, in which he stated some of his difficulties in attempting to secure payment from the principal debtor. The part of the letter relied upon as notice was as follows: "We see no way of securing ourselves from Gibson unless suit be brought against all of us, and when judgment is obtained we will direct the sheriff to make as much of the money from him as we can. The balance we will, of course, have to pay. If any other course is pursued we would lose the whole of it." The creditor answered this letter by suggesting a partial payment and objecting to suit, and no reply was made thereafter.

In Herbert v. Hobbs (1830) 3 Stew. (Ala.) 9, where the sureties, not having interposed the defense of a failure of the creditors to sue upon a verbal notice in an action at law in which the creditors obtained a judgment against them, sought in an equitable action to prevent the collection of the judgment, it was held that, as they did not insist on the benefit of the verbal notice in their defense to the action at law, they were precluded from relying on it as a ground of equitable jurisdiction.

That a verbal notice is sufficient is the theory of the Arkansas cases cited in note 18, supra, but this theory is overruled in Sims v. EVERETT, ante, 7.

That a mere request by the surety to bring suit is not sufficient to release him upon the failure of the creditor to sue in compliance therewith is the opinion of Scott, J., in Routon v. Lacy (1853) 17 Mo. 399. This case is cited in an obiter statement in Langdon v. Markle (1871) 48 Mo. 357, to the proposition that a verbal notice is insufficient at common law. It seems evident, however, that the court in the earlier case was not considering the sufficiency of a verbal notice.

In Cope v. Smith (1822) 8 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 110, 11 Am. Dec. 582, it is stated that the court has no right to say "that a request of this sort should be void unless in writing, but certainly it would be best to make it in writing, because of the difficulty of establishing the truth with sufficient accuracy by parol evidence; and when the penalty is so great on the creditor as the loss of his debt, the surety who sets up this defense should be held to strict proof."

<sup>58</sup> Wetzel v. Sponsler (1852) 18 Pa. 460. In this case a son of the surety who transacted his business served the notice. It is stated by the court that the notice need not be given by the surety in person; that he may employ an agent, and if he has a general agent who transacts all his business, it is the duty of such general agent, without special instruction, to give the notice in a proper case, and the validity of a notice so given is not to be questioned for want of authority.

It was by the trial court left for the jury to say, in Klingensmith v. Klingensmith (1868) 31 Pa. 460, whether a son of the surety was authorized to give the notice, and this was held proper by the supreme court.

time administratrix.<sup>59</sup> A notice given by the husbands of the heirs (who were also legatees) of a deceased surety at a time when there was a personal representative has been held not a sufficient notice, especially where it was given in advance of the maturity of the note.<sup>60</sup>

(e) To whom must notice be given.

The sufficiency of notice to an attorney, generally, has been doubted.<sup>61</sup> But a notice to the attorney for a divorced woman who had caused the arrest of her former husband, by the sureties on his bail bond, to take him into custody, was held to be a notice to the proper person, and equivalent to a notice to the woman.<sup>62</sup> It is stated that the attorneys had charge of the litigation, that their authority as attorneys continued after the decision of the case for the purpose of entering judgment and issuing execution, and it would be very inconvenient, and contrary to the common understanding, to hold that in a case like this they did not represent the plaintiff.

Where the creditor has gone out of the state, leaving the obligation in the hands of his son as his agent for collection, the notice to sue may be addressed to the agent;<sup>63</sup> it is not necessary to follow the creditor, or wait until he returns.

A notice to the husband to "collect the money loaned," as the surety "would not stand accountable any longer," is not a notice to the wife so as to relieve the surety for failure of the wife to collect, especially where the husband held a note himself similarly secured.<sup>64</sup> A notice given to the husband of the holder of a note, treating him as the owner of the note and requesting him to bring suit, is insufficient, although communicated to the wife.<sup>65</sup>

In regard to corporate agents it has been stated that, "when a request of this nature is to be made of a corporation, to be effective, it should be formally made and communicated to one charged with the subject. . . . Persons seeking to charge a corporation with notice to, or with acts or omissions of, its agents, must see to it that the notice is communicated to, or that the act or omission proceeds from, a person charged with a duty in the premises." Accordingly, notice given to a member of the law department of a large corporation, who was neither president nor a member of the finance committee of the corporation, having control of matters such as that involved, was held not sufficient notice.<sup>66</sup>

(f) Waiver of effect of notice.

The surety may, after he has given a proper notice to the creditor, waive his right to have the suit begun.<sup>67</sup>

<sup>59</sup> Gardner v. Ferree (1826) 15 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 28, 16 Am. Dec. 513. Whether or not this request, if communicated immediately, would have been sufficient, is not decided; it is stated that after the lapse of the time which expired the request came too late.

to her through the husband. He was treated as the owner of the note, which he was clearly not, without the precaution of inquiry as to whom the note really belonged to. On the point that the notice had been communicated to the wife, it is stated that the evidence amounted to no more than that the husband informed her of the conversation the surety had had with him, not about what he wanted her to do, but what he wanted the husband to do.

The common law defense available to the surety because of the failure of the creditor to sue the principal debtor upon request by the surety is not waived by a letter in regard to the obligation expressing a hope of settlement, where it does not appear that by reason of the letter the creditor did any act or omitted to do any that has in any way operated to his prejudice. Crandall v. Moston (1897) 24 App. Div. 547, 50 N. Y. Supp. 145. It is stated that there was no promise contained in the letter to pay the debt; certainly there was no express promise in it, and a mere acknowledgment is not sufficient. It is further stated that the surety did not have full knowledge

3. When suit must be brought.

There is very little authority under the equitable rule as to when suit must be brought. The rule has been stated that the creditor is bound not only to commence his suit against the principal immediately or without any unnecessary delay, but must prosecute it with all reasonable diligence, must arbitrate the cause if that be required by the circumstances or demanded by the surety, and must use all those means of saving the surety which the existing state of the law puts in his power, and which a prudent man would adopt to save himself.<sup>68</sup> Again, it has been stated as a general rule that the creditor, after receiving proper and explicit notice from the surety to sue the principal, should do so at the next court, if there is a reasonable time intervening and nothing to prevent, and that he should act promptly in obtaining judgment.<sup>69</sup>

A request upon the creditor to enforce securities held by him, which in some jurisdictions is held to come within the operation of the rule, does "not impose the absolute duty upon the plaintiff [the creditor] to proceed at once. It [the creditor] held these securities for two notes, upon one of which the defendants were not indorsers. It was to judge, of all the facts which operated to discharge him at the time of writing the letter, and therefore there could be no waiver, because a waiver can be made out only upon full knowledge of all the facts.

<sup>68</sup> Wetzel v. Sponsler (Pa.) supra. In this case the notice was given on the 19th of January, when, according to the creditor's evidence, it was too late to sue out a writ to the January term, he claiming that it would have required until the 27th of the following August, the second term after the suit was brought, to obtain judgment by the ordinary course of law; that suit was brought on the 2d of May and judgment obtained by arbitration on the 1st of June following, two months and twenty-six days sooner than if suit had been brought on the 19th of January, 1850, and not arbitrated. This defense was held not sufficient as a matter of law to excuse the failure to bring the suit sooner. Accordingly, the question was left to the jury. A verdict was rendered for the surety on instructions as to the law, similar to that announced by the supreme court in the text above.

<sup>69</sup> Donough v. Boger (1874) 10 Phila. (Pa.) 616. In this case the note fell due April 2, and notice was given at or about maturity. The last day for issuing writs to the next term of court was on the 23d of May. The writ was not issued until the 31st of May. It was held that to discharge the surety it was necessary for him to show that a service could have been had acting in good faith, when it was best to convert them. If it delayed unreasonably, or was guilty of bad faith or gross negligence in the care and management of the property mortgaged to it, and the securities were thus damaged, they would, undoubtedly, to the extent of such damage, have a defense to the note."<sup>70</sup>

4. What contracts are within operation of rule.

The equitable rule has been applied to relieve sureties on a great variety of contracts. Sureties on the bond of a church treasurer, conditioned upon the faithful performance of his duties and the accounting for all moneys received by him, have been held to be within the operation of the rule.<sup>71</sup> The doctrine was held applicable to a suretyship arising from the dissolution of a partnership and the agreement by the continuing partner to pay the debts of the firm, the retiring partner being treated as surety, and the failure of the creditor to proceed against the continuing partner upon notice was held to release the surety.<sup>72</sup> It was held applicable also to a suretyship resulting from a sale of mortgaged premises in which the purchaser assumed payment of the mortgage.<sup>73</sup> The rule upon the principal debtor between the 23d and 31st of May, and that he was injured by this delay.

<sup>70</sup> Black River Bank v. Page (1871) 44 N. Y. 453. In this case the court found that the creditor acted in good faith and was not guilty of culpable neglect. The delay in enforcing the securities was less than a year. There was no proof that the securities could have been or ought to have been foreclosed sooner; that the property would have sold for more at an earlier date, or that anyone was damaged by the delay; accordingly, the surety was held not released.

<sup>73</sup> Russell v. Weinberg (1877) 2 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 422. It was held in this case that, upon a foreclosure of the mortgage after the premises had depreciated so as to make it altogether probable that there would be a deficiency after applying the proceeds of the sale, no judgment could be rendered against the mortgagor, who had by a previous sale become a surety. It is stated that, if the purchaser, who at the time of the foreclosure occupied the position of principal debtor, was solvent, it was the duty of the holder of the mortgage to collect the deficiency from him; and if he was insolvent, the surety had suffered through the failure of the holder of the

has been applied to a surety on a bail bond, so that he was released by a failure of the complainant against the principal to take the principal in execution, upon notice by the surety, when this could have been done.<sup>74</sup> A surety on an adjournment bond has been held released by the failure of a judgment creditor to issue execution on his judgment as soon as it could legally have been done, so that the judgment debtor might have been surrendered by the surety.<sup>75</sup>

But the New York court refused to apply the doctrine of Paine v. Packard and King v. Baldwin to a case in which a party took a note in payment of a debt and then transferred it in part payment for a farm purchased by him, and at the time of the transfer signed it under the maker's signature. It is stated that such debt to enforce it as required by the notice, and therefore was relieved of liability.

In Remsen v. Beekman (1862) 25 N. Y. 552, a mortgagee, upon a sale of the mortgaged premises, released all but a small part of the premises from the mortgage upon the purchaser giving a bond guaranteed by another for the payment of the remaining amount due on the mortgage. Subsequently, the premises were conveyed to the person who had guaranteed the payment of the bond, and by him conveyed subject to the mortgage in satisfaction of certain debts owed by him and his grantor. He then called upon the original mortgagee to enforce his mortgage against the land which was then sufficient to satisfy it. The mortgagee failed to do so, but allowed his debt to run until the land had become insufficient to satisfy the mortgage. The person who had thus guaranteed the payment of the bond, and had subsequently become the owner of the premises, was held to stand in the relation of surety and to be released by the failure of the mortgagee to enforce his mortgage.

<sup>74</sup> Toles v. Adey (1881) 84 N. Y. 222. The bond involved was not a valid bail bond, but was treated as an ordinary surety contract. It was held that the surety was not entitled to protect himself as a surety on a valid bail bond might, by the surrender of his principal, but that he had the right of an ordinary surety to require due diligence on the part of the plaintiff in pursuing his remedies against the principal, and inasmuch as laches in that respect had been charged, the question of laches should be submitted to the jury. On a second appeal of this case, reported in (1883) 91 N. Y. 562, there was held to be such laches as released the surety as a matter of law.

The general rule applicable to a case in which a creditor refuses to proceed when required by a surety was applied in the case of sureties on a bond to indemnify L.R.A.1918C.

person was not a surety within the rule of these cases, and the omission of the holder of the note to prosecute the maker upon his request did not discharge him from liability, although the maker subsequently became insolvent.<sup>76</sup>

An indorser is held not to be a surety within the operation of this rule.<sup>77</sup>

5. Effect of discharge of one surety upon cosureties.

Where one surety has been released by the failure of the creditor to sue, the discharge has been held to inure to the benefit of all sureties, since the right of contribution which theretofore existed has been destroyed; the notice to sue inures to the benefit of the cosureties.<sup>78</sup> On the contrary, it has been held that the release of one surety on a joint and several obligation, by the failure of the bail. Carr v. Sutton (1912) 70 W. Va. 417, 74 S. E. 239, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 453. The exact notice that was given in this case does not appear. The court, without detailing the evidence, stated that it showed conclusively that, at the time the sureties signed the bond, the bail was notified to keep a close surveillance over the prisoner, and if he observed any disposition to escape, to at once arrest him and deliver him to jail, and that if an indictment should be returned against him, he should immediately deliver him into the custody of the officer.

Beardsley v. Warner (1831) 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 610. Upon appeal to the court of errors that court held, in (1831) 8 Wend. 194, that the surety was not released for the reason stated in the text to note 32, supra, and accordingly the judgment was affirmed. One of the senators who voted for an affirmance of the judgment expressly stated that it was not necessary to decide whether an indorser was a surety within the meaning of this rule.

On the contrary, an accommodation indorser was, without discussion, held entitled to the rights of a surety in Thompson v. Watson (1837) 10 Yerg. (Tenn.) 362.

That an indorser is not a surety within the meaning of the statutory rule, see infra, III. b, 11.

The general question of the release of an indorser of a note by failure to enforce the liability of the maker is discussed in the note to Rogers v. Detroit Sav. Bank, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 530.

creditor to sue as required by notice given by him, does not release a cosurety.<sup>79</sup>

6. Notice to enforce security.

Where collateral security has been taken by the creditor in addition to the direct obligation of the principal debtor and surety to pay the money, it has been held that the surety cannot require the creditor to proceed to the enforcement of the collateral security.<sup>80</sup> A notice given by the surety to proceed upon the collateral security is ineffectual as a defense to the surety to an action on the note,<sup>81</sup> even though it is shown that the collateral security has depreciated in value so that it is no longer sufficient to pay the debt.<sup>82</sup> A surety on a note which stated that it was given for the rent of a farm has been held not to be released from liability on the note by the failure of the landlord to enforce a lien against his tenant upon notice from the surety, since the landlord was entitled to the payment of money, and was not required to enforce any lien he might have.<sup>83</sup>

The surety has, however, in some jurisdictions, been relieved of his liability by failure of the creditor to enforce securities.<sup>84</sup> In one such case it is stated

not to have been contended "that it makes any difference in the rule, or in the application of the principles on which it is founded, that the principal to which the creditor refuses or neglects to resort, when he should, is a fund or property primarily liable for the debt in exoneration of the surety, instead of being a person so primarily liable."<sup>84</sup> Thus, the surety of a tenant has been held to be relieved by the failure of the landlord to claim a preference to which he was entitled in the proceeds of a sale under execution of the tenant's goods, as requested to do by the surety.<sup>85</sup>

The general question of the duty of a creditor to a surety with respect to management and collection of collateral is discussed in another note in this series of reports.<sup>86</sup>

7. Effect of statute upon equitable rule.

In jurisdictions in which the rule now under consideration has been adopted, the question arises upon the adoption of a statute as to whether the equitable rule is abrogated by the statute, or whether the statute is merely cumulative. It is a theory of some cases holding to the equitable rule, that a statute on the subject is merely cumulative.<sup>87</sup> Hence the surety may resort to this right as given him under the equitable rule, although a statute has been enacted.<sup>88</sup> Other courts take the view that any rights the surety may have to require the creditor to sue are defined by a statute on this question.<sup>89</sup>

III. Rule under statute.

a. Statutes codifying equitable rule.

Statutes have been quite generally enacted governing the rights of a surety as to requiring the creditor to bring suit upon the obligation. Some statutes are a practical codification of the equitable rule above discussed.<sup>90</sup> Under this form of statute prejudice or injury to the surety from the failure to sue must be shown in order to release the surety.<sup>91</sup> These statutes, at least, as construed by the courts of Oklahoma, go further than the equitable rule and make it a condition of the right of the surety to require the creditor to sue that the surety cannot himself pursue the remedy.

In Oklahoma there is, in addition to the statute conferring upon the surety the right to require the creditor to sue, another statute which is interpreted to give to the holder of an obligation or instrument, including bills and notes, the option as to which one of the parties he will sue.<sup>92</sup> This statute is treated as negating the right of the surety to require the creditor to proceed against the principal under the statute first referred to.<sup>93</sup> But the surety under the statute first referred to can require the creditor to pursue any other remedy in his power which the surety cannot himself pursue, and which would lighten his burden, and if the creditor neglects to do so on notice, the surety is exonerated to the extent to which he is thereby prejudiced.<sup>94</sup>

But if the remedy is within the power of the surety, he must pursue it; he cannot call on the creditor to do so.<sup>95</sup> The failure of the payee of a promissory note to sue the principal upon the oral request of the surety sued, made to an attorney of the payee, who had the note for collection, long after the maturity of the note, does not operate as a release of the surety sued, even though the principal at the time the request was made was solvent and amply able to pay the note, and in the meantime he and the other surety thereon became insolvent, the court stating that it is the duty of the surety, upon the failure of the principal to pay the note when due, to pay the same and pursue his remedy against the principal and the cosurety.<sup>96</sup>

A surety is not released by the failure of the creditor, upon demand, to proceed against a third person who had taken property held by the creditor under a chattel mortgage executed by the prin-

Nichols v. McDowell (1853) 14 B. Mon. (Ky.) 6, see supra, note 9.

That the common law is repealed by a statute on the question is the opinion of the court in Jenkins v. Clarkson (1835) 7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 72.

<sup>90</sup> The Dakota statute involved in Kennedy v. Falde (1886) 4 Dak. 319, 29 N. W. 667, and Bailey Loan Co. v. Seward (1806) 9 S. D. 326, 69 N. W. 58, was of this kind, as is also the Oklahoma statute set out in UNION MUT. INS. CO. v. PAGE, ante, 1. L.R.A.1918C.

In the absence of a demand the surety cannot claim any rights under this statute. Baker v. Gaines Bros. Co. (1917) — Okla. —, 166 Pac. 159; Bailey Loan Co. v. Seward (1896) 9 S. D. 326, 69 N. W. 58.

<sup>91</sup> Bingham v. Mears (1894) 4 N. D. 437, 27 L.R.A. 257, 61 N. W. 808, holding it no defense to an action against sureties on an appeal undertaking that the plaintiff held security sufficient to pay the claim, and refused on demand to resort to such security for payment, where there was no proof that the sureties were prejudiced by such refusal.

It is apparently the theory of the court in Bailey Loan Co. v. Seward (S. D.) supra, where a creditor was called upon to enforce collateral, that it must be shown that the collateral was of some value in order to bring the rule into operation.

principal as further security for his debt, where the creditor at the time refused to take such action and advised the surety that, if he would pay the balance due on the note, the creditor would deliver the mortgage to him for the purpose of allowing him to take any proceedings thereon he might desire, a proposition that he refused; in such a case the remedy was within the power of the surety.<sup>97</sup>

As to the effect of the Negotiable Instruments Act upon the Oklahoma statute, see infra, III. b, 2.

The ordinary form of statute on this subject is not a mere codification of the equitable rule. The statutes vary, but in general provide for notice by a surety to the creditor to bring suit on the obligation, and, in case of a failure to bring the suit within a stated time or "forthwith" or within a reasonable time, provide that the surety shall be released. Under such a statute the failure of a creditor to bring suit as required, upon notice from the surety, relieves the surety of liability on the obligation.<sup>98</sup>

Under the ordinary form of statute, which contains no provision as to injury to the surety, the surety is held to be relieved independently of any question of injury growing out of the delay.<sup>99</sup> The surety is released by failure to sue within the statutory period, even though it appear that the surety in fact sustained no injury.<sup>100</sup>

As shown below, according to the majority view the suit must be brought whether the debtor is solvent or insolvent.<sup>101</sup>

Under a statute empowering the surety to require the creditor to sue, or permit the surety to commence suit in his name,<sup>102</sup> the mere failure of the creditor to sue does not release the surety, if he has given the surety permission to sue.<sup>103</sup>

After the notice has been given under such a statute, the surety need take no further steps. The creditor must then act in response to the demand either by suing or authorizing the surety to bring suit, and if he fails to do so for the statutory period the surety is released.<sup>104</sup> And this is not changed by the fact that the surety was a director in the bank which was the holder of the instrument, especially when it does not appear that it was his official duty to institute the suit, or that he had custody of the note, or that, as an officer of the bank, he was guilty of any negligence or fraud in respect to the transaction.<sup>105</sup>

Under a statute empowering a surety who "apprehends that his principal is about to become insolvent," to give notice to the creditor to sue, the surety's apprehension cannot be put in issue.<sup>106</sup>

As to waiver of the defense provided by these statutes, see infra, III. b, 15.

It is stated in State use of Snell v. Reynolds (1832) 3 Mo. 95, that any indulgence by the creditor to the principal debtor after the surety has notified the creditor to sue, to the injury of the surety, discharges the surety from his liability. No statute is referred to, but apparently a statute was in force.

<sup>99</sup> Shehan v. Hampton (1846) 8 Ala. 942. The statute provided that a creditor failing to comply with the requisition of the surety to put the instrument in suit "shall thereby forfeit the right which he otherwise would have had, to demand and receive of such security the amount of such bond, bill, or note."

Bruce v. Edwards (1827) 1 Stew. (Ala.) 11, 18 Am. Dec. 33 (dictum.)

It is not necessary for a surety to show that he has suffered some injury from the neglect of the creditor to sue, where the statute imposes no such burden. Shenan-L.R.A.1918C.

In Graham v. Rush (1887) 73 Iowa, 451, 35 N. W. 518, it was urged, as a ground for not releasing the surety on account of the failure of the creditor to sue, that at the time of the notice the principal debtor had already become insolvent and had removed from the state, and therefore the surety could not have apprehended that his principal was about to become insolvent or remove permanently from the state. In answer to this argument the court simply states that it is sufficient to say that the evidence did not show that the principal debtor was insolvent at the time of service of the written notice and request, but that he was insolvent some time prior thereto. Nothing is said as to his removal.

the subject of discussion in this note prescribe a method of release of a surety. When the instrument from which the release is sought is negotiable, it has been urged in jurisdictions in which the Negotiable Instruments Act is in force that the methods of release of the parties to negotiable instruments therein provided are exclusive; hence a surety can no longer be released by failure of the creditor to sue upon notice, that not being one of the methods of release provided in the Negotiable Instruments Act. The supreme court of Tennessee has agreed with this contention and treated the provisions of that act in this regard as exclusive, repealing the statutory provision for a release of a surety by failure to sue after notice so far as it conflicts with the provisions of the Negotiable Instruments Act.<sup>106</sup> But in Oklahoma the discharge provided by such a statute has been held to be an enlargement of the grounds of discharge provided by the Negotiable Instruments Act.<sup>107</sup>

2. Sufficiency of demand or notice.

(a) In general.

As is true in the case of the notice under the equitable rule discussed in II. b, 2, supra, no general statement can be framed that will determine the sufficiency of the notice in all contingencies. It has been stated generally that the notice must be a clear expression to the creditor that the surety expects and requires him to proceed in the collection of the debt against the principal.<sup>108</sup> A mere inquiry seeking to ascertain whether the creditor has filed a claim with the receiver of the principal debtor is not sufficient.<sup>109</sup> It must be a demand or requirement to proceed to collect the debt, <sup>106</sup> Graham v. Shephard (1916) 136 Tenn. 418, 189 S. W. 867. This opinion was expressed in a case in which the surety, who signed as maker, his suretyship not appearing, was seeking relief on the ground of an extension of time. It does not appear, at least not expressly, that the surety was seeking relief also because of failure to sue after notice.

A notice directed to the creditor as follows: "You are hereby required at once to proceed and collect the note you hold dated the 17th of April, 1872, for $178.50, upon which I am surety and James Satterfield is principal; that I will stand no longer,"—is a sufficient notice. Iliff v. Weymouth (1883) 40 Ohio St. 101.

A notice directed to the creditor as follows: "You are hereby requested to commence an action forthwith against Alexander McKee, on a promissory note which you now hold against said Alexander McKee, and signed by said McKee and also signed by one William Clark, now deceased; said McKee is principal debtor in said note and said Clark was at the time of his death bound as surety," and signed by executors of the surety, was held sufficient in Clark v. Osborn (1884) 41 Ohio St. 28. The use of the word "request" instead of the word "required" was held not to vitiate the notice.

A notice in writing in the language following: "I hereby wish to inform you that I am not a principal on the note of $300, signed by S. Dwyer, Ed. Dwyer, and Mrs. A. Dwyer and myself, but that I signed same only as surety. Under no consideration will I consent to a prolongation of said note, and hereby request you respectfully to use every effort to collect L.R.A.1918C.

said note from the Dwyer family," is a sufficient notice under statute. Sullivan v. Dwyer (1897) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 42 S. W. 355. It is stated not to be essential to such notices that they be worded in the very language of the statute; a notification to use every effort to collect is stated to be a notice to sue; that it can mean nothing else than a demand for suit forthwith; whereas in this case the notice is coupled with a virtual demand that it be no longer held. Neither is the notice insufficient because it was merely a request to collect from the principal and the other sureties.

Edmonson v. Potts (1910) 111 Va. 79, 68 N. E. 254, 21 Ann. Cas. 1365. The notice here was given by the administrator of the surety, and was to the effect that the creditors should "take such action as was necessary to get Mr. Pott's name off the note." It is stated that, to discharge a surety, the surety, in giving the notice, must comply substantially with the statute, and must show a clear, unequivocal, and distinct demand upon or command to the creditor to institute suit upon the contract. The statute in question authorized the surety to require the creditor "forthwith to institute suit" upon the contract.

See McNeilly v. Cooksey (1878) 2 Lea (Tenn.) 39, infra, note 163, for a notice held insufficient.

A request by a surety after suit had been begun in an ordinary action upon the note, and the surety served with process therein, to attach property of the debtor, is stated in Thompson v. Robinson (1879) 34 Ark. 44, not to be "a notice in writing to sue under the statute." Whether this is because the request was not in writing, or because it was not a request to sue, is not made plain.

and so understood by the parties at the time.<sup>110</sup> The rule has been announced that a notice which is positive in its demand to sue, and does not mislead the creditor as to the instrument to be sued upon, is sufficient.<sup>111</sup> It must require the creditor to institute an action forthwith upon the contract, under statutes empowering the surety to require the creditor "forthwith to institute an action," or "to commence an action on such instrument forthwith."<sup>112</sup> A mere ex-

And see cases cited infra, note 112.

<sup>111</sup> Alabama Nat. Bank v. Hunt (1899) 125 Ala. 512, 28 So. 488. In this case a letter written by the surety to the creditor upon receipt of a notice from the creditor concerning the note, stating that "your notice concerning the note of [the debtor] to hand. Under the circumstances of the case I shall resist my liability on the note. This is to notify you that you must take all needful legal steps to fasten on me any liability. You must sue [the debtor] as the law requires, and sue at once," and signed by the surety, was held to comply with the statute as to notice. The case of Sheehan v. Hampton, infra, note 122, is referred to and held not to conflict with this ruling.

<sup>112</sup> Kaufman v. Wilson (1868) 29 Ind. 504. A notice to the holder of a note to "express N. & Co's note to Esquire Bennett for collection to-day. Dont fail," is insufficient. It is stated that this notice does not require the holder to institute an action forthwith upon the contract or note, but to express it to Esquire Bennett for collection. For aught that appears it was the intention of the surety that he or the debtors would pay it. It is further stated that it was not the province of the surety to direct in whose hands the note should be placed for collection, but by notice in writing to require the holder forthwith to institute an action on the note against the principals. The notice involved was sent by telegraph, but no point is made of this fact.

McMillin v. Deardorff (1897) 18 Ind. App. 428, 48 N. E. 233. The notice in this case, given by the surety to the holder of the note, was as follows: "Sue the note which I signed as surety for Rue, or I will not continue to be responsible as surety," and was signed by the surety. It is stated that the language of the notice may as well be said to be a direction to sue in a reasonable time as it may be said to be a direction to sue forthwith or immediately or at once; and therefore does not comply with the statute which requires the use of language equivalent to the requirement therein "forthwith to institute an action."

A note in the language following: "The writer, having disposed of his holdings in the Valley Paper Company, begs to advise you that you do not extend any further credit on the strength of his indorsement and on notes given by Valley Paper Company. These notes fall due on demand, and I want you to enforce collection or consider my indorsement canceled,"—is not L.R.A.1918C.

a sufficient notice. Frye v. Eisenbeiss (1914) 56 Ind. App. 123, 104 N. E. 995. It is stated that the first sentence of the notice is not peremptory, but advisory only; the second sentence expresses a desire only that the bank enforce collection or consider the surety's indorsement as canceled, and on the whole the language used indicates no demand or notice to bring suit forthwith or at any time.

In Baker v. Kellogg (1876) 29 Ohio. St. 663, a notice as follows: "I wish you would proceed against I. C. Nickols, and collect that note on which I am bail, belonging to Mr. Brim's estate, or have it arranged in some way to release me, as I do not wish to remain his bail any longer,"—is held an insufficient notice under a statute empowering the surety to require the creditor forthwith to commence an action against the principal debtor. It is stated that under this statute the requirement must be unconditional; it must be a requirement to proceed by action and to proceed forthwith.

A notice directed to the creditor containing the following language: "Unless you hear from us to the contrary by 10 A. M. to-morrow, December 17, 1891, we require you to take judgment on the D. J. McConnell note,"—does not contain a peremptory requirement of the surety on the creditor to commence suit forthwith, or any equivalent language, and is therefore insufficient. Porter v. First Nat. Bank (1896) 54 Ohio St. 155, 43 N. E. 165.

A letter written to an attorney who has a note for collection, in answer to a letter from him requesting payment, to "please collect of Mr. Beers all you can of this amount and notify me, and I will arrange for the balance,"—is not a sufficient notice under the statute. It is stated that this is rather more of a wish than a positive demand, but even if it is sufficiently peremptory it does not require action forthwith within the meaning of the statute. Haaskell v. Beers (1906) 16 Ohio Dec. 368.

A letter by a surety to the creditor inquiring as to a note, in which there is the statement: "I wish you would come up and do something with it. He [the maker] has plenty of property now to make your money,"—is not a sufficient notice within a statute authorizing the surety to require the creditor by notice in writing forthwith to put the note in suit. Rice v. Simpson (1872) 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 809.

A letter written by the surety on a note, who had taken property from the principal debtor under a chattel mortgage given to secure him, stating to the creditor, who had sold the property to the debtor and had received in payment the note in pression of desire or request that suit be brought is not sufficient;<sup>113</sup> nor is advice to the creditor that he should attempt to collect sufficient.<sup>114</sup> There must be an explicit notice that unless the creditor institutes suit the surety will hold himself discharged.<sup>115</sup> A mere statement that the surety will no longer stand as security is not sufficient;<sup>116</sup> nor that he does not intend to pay until forced to do suit: "If you wish to take the property back in order to make yourself whole, we are willing to let you have it. If this is not done, it will be necessary for you to exhaust every means possible to get it out of [the principal debtor], as we do not intend to pay any more of the notes until we are forced to do so"—is not a sufficient notice under the statute. Williams v. J. Ogg & K. Lumber Co. (1906) 42 Tex. Civ. App. 558, 94 S. W. 420.

A letter written by a surety in reply to a demand from the holder of a note for payment, stating that he was only surety on the note and that the other signer was the principal and had property subject to execution sufficient to pay off said note, and that he wanted the holder to collect the money from the principal to pay off the note, is not a sufficient notice. Naylor v. Anderson (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 178 S. W. 620.

A letter written by the surety in reply to one received from the creditor requesting payment stating: "Yours of the 12th came to hand. If you hold any note signed by C. M. Rider and ourselves, C. M. Rider is the principal and we are only his sureties, and we notify you to commence an action on the note forthwith and proceed to collect it. Rider is able to pay his own notes," is a sufficient notice under the statute. Meriden Silver Plate Co. v. Flory (1886) 44 Ohio St. 430, 7 N. E. 753. It is stated that "here was no condition, and there was a substantial compliance with the statute. This is sufficient."

See Iliff v. Weymouth (1883) 40 Ohio St. 101, supra, note 108.

See Sullivan v. Dwyer (1897) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 42 S. W. 355, supra, note 108.

A notice directed to the holders of a note, stating that "the note of J. T. McKinstry, on which I am surety, dated in December, 1906, for something over $500. You will please file your claim with the probate court for payment. The estate of said J. T. McKinstry is now being represented in said court by Mrs. Ella E. McKinstry, as administratrix, and there is plenty of property or funds there to pay you. Please kindly see to this matter at once and oblige,"—is insufficient. National Bank v. Gilvin (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 152 S. W. 652. The court states that the notice "must be a full, explicit, and peremptory demand that suit be brought forthwith, with the further statement that the surety will not be bound any further if such is not done."

<sup>113</sup> A letter written by a surety to the creditor, stating that "I am desirous that you should bring suit on . . . note on which I am security to . . . due about L.R.A.1918C.

January, 1854, for somewhere about $860 when given, before any payments were made. I should prefer that you would enter suit early in August in Clarke county, so that the principal could not have the same time to dodge. You might then obtain judgment in Clarke county, so that yours would be older than judgments obtained in Marengo,"—is not a notice to the creditor "to bring suit" on the note. Savage v. Carleton (1859) 33 Ala. 443. It is stated that this notice contains no language which can be fairly construed into a demand or requisition on the part of the surety that suit should be brought on the note. It was accordingly held that the failure of the creditor to comply with this notice by bringing suit did not discharge the surety.

A notice by the surety on a note to the holder of the note, requesting the holder to put it "in a train of collection, as he had reason to believe they [the debtors] would avoid payment if possible," is not a sufficient notice under a statute authorizing a notice in writing requiring the person having the right of action forthwith to commence suit against the principal debtor and other party liable. Bates v. State Bank (1847) 7 Ark. 394, 46 Am. Dec. 293.

The notice in Rice v. Simpson (1872) 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 809, was held a mere expression of a wish that the creditor would collect the debt, and was therefore insufficient.

See Parrish v. Gray, infra, note 120.

See Branch Bank v. Perdue, supra, note 81, as to notice to foreclose mortgage.

That the use of the word "request" instead of "require" does not necessarily invalidate the notice, see Clark v. Osborn (1884) 41 Ohio St. 28, supra.

<sup>114</sup> Benge v. Eversole (1913) 156 Ky. 131, 160 S. W. 911. The surety had here written a number of letters to the creditor advising the creditor of the condition of the debtor and stating that some attempt should be made to collect.

<sup>115</sup> A letter written by the surety to the creditor, using the language: "You had better collect the same from . . . the principal,"—is not a requirement within the meaning of a statute providing that the surety may require his creditor to proceed against the principal. Kennedy v. Falde (1886) 4 Dak. 319, 29 N. W. 667. It was also stated that this would not be a sufficient notice within the equitable rule.

<sup>116</sup> Lockridge v. Upton (1857) 24 Mo. 184. The notice here was as follows: "You are hereby notified that I will not stand good as security any longer on the note you hold against William Upton and myself as security." It is stated that there so.<sup>117</sup> A suit begun by the surety is not notice under the statute.<sup>118</sup>

A demand by a surety that the creditor "collect" the debt from the debtor is not a sufficient demand under a statute authorizing him to require the creditor "to bring suit thereon against the principal debtor;"<sup>119</sup> nor is it sufficient under a statute empowering the surety to require by notice in writing, the creditor forthwith to put the bond, etc., in suit, and unless "the creditor so required to put such bond," etc., "in suit, shall within thirty days thereafter commence an action on such bond," etc., "he shall forfeit the right to demand of the security

the amount due by such bond," etc.<sup>120</sup> On the contrary, it has been held that a notice by the surety on a note to the holder thereof, "to proceed at once to collect the note," couple with a statement that the principal debtor is solvent and able to pay it, is a sufficient compliance with a statute requiring a notice "forthwith to institute an action upon the contract."<sup>121</sup>

The notice must point out with sufficient particularity the note upon which a suit is desired.<sup>122</sup> But a notice which did not point out the note has been held sufficient where no uncertainty resulted from the omission.<sup>123</sup> ought to be an explicit direction to sue that there may be no misapprehension of the meaning.

A notice to the creditor to take such action as may be necessary to get the surety's name off the note is not a sufficient compliance with the statute authorizing the surety to require the creditor "forthwith to institute suit." Edmonson v. Potts (1910) 111 Va. 79, 68 N. E. 254, 21 Ann. Cas. 1365.

See McNeilly v. Cooksey (1878) 2 Lea (Tenn.) 39, infra, note 162.

<sup>118</sup> Barnes v. Mowry (1891) 129 Ind. 568, 28 N. E. 535. Apparently the suit in question in this case was one begun by the surety to compel the payment of the debt by the debtor, but the nature of the suit is not made clear.

<sup>120</sup> Parrish v. Gray (1839) 1 Humph. (Tenn.) 87. The notice was as follows: "I wish you to collect the debt out of Polson, wherein I am security." This is stated not to require the creditor to put the bond in suit, but simply to express a wish that he would "collect" the debt; and, continuing, the court states: "That the request to collect is not a requisition to sue is evident."

<sup>121</sup> Franklin v. Franklin (1880) 71 Ind. 573. The surety, however, was held not to have been released for other reasons.

And in Weir v. Dicker (1889) 11 Ky. L. Rep. 523, a notice to the creditor that he must "collect the note" is held a sufficient compliance with a statute empowering the surety to require the creditor "to sue."

But see Sullivan v. Dwyer (1897) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 42 S. W. 355, supra, note 108.

<sup>122</sup> Shehan v. Hampton (1846) 8 Ala. 942. land as for the personal property of the said deceased, as soon as the law will permit, or I shall no longer stand as surety," and was signed by the surety. In discussing the sufficiency of this notice, the court states that it is bad "alike under the statute and at common law, in not setting out that the party giving the notice is in point of fact a surety for Joel Chandler. Conceding that the notice in other respects may be general, or at least with regard to the sum, date, and description of the instrument by which the surety is bound, yet in this instance the notice or writing gives no intimation to the creditor that he is required to proceed by suit upon any note in which Joel Chandler is the principal debtor. The notice is too general and indeterminate in this particular to warrant any presumption that the defendant demanded this particular note should be put in suit."

A written notice handed to the payee in the words: "I hereby notify C. M. Hunter [the payee] to sue; that I will not stay on note for G. S. Musetter any longer," was held sufficient in W. P. Brown & Sons Lumber Co. v. Steele (1915) 195 Ala. 211, 70 So. 161, there being but one note and the payee knowing who was the principal debtor and who the surety.

See Pickens v. Yarbrough, supra, note 45.

<sup>123</sup> Routon v. Lacy (1853) 17 Mo. 399. It is here stated that to require of the surety an accurate description of the note, its date, amount, or even the names of all the cosureties would render it impossible to comply with the statute in many cases, as the note is not accessible to the surety, and it is not to be expected that he could remember such circumstances. It is further stated that, if any confusion or uncertainty should be created by reason of the surety's name being on two obligations, it is in the power of the creditor to show it by producing them. The notice in this case was as follows: "You are hereby notified that the estate of William Hall, deceased, will no longer stand security for Tillman A. Todd, unless suit is commenced and prosecuted according to law."

Failure to comply with the express provision of a statute, that the notice to sue must state the county of the principal's residence, renders the notice ineffectual.<sup>124</sup>

Under a statute authorizing the giving of notice by a surety whenever he "shall apprehend that his principal is likely to become insolvent or to migrate from this state," it is not necessary that the notice specify the apprehension of the surety.<sup>125</sup>

In a number of cases no general test as to the sufficiency of the notice is given; the facts in the case at bar are examined, and sufficiency of the notice determined from these without reference to any general test.<sup>126</sup>

A notice which requests the creditor to sue the principal before suing the surety has been held not to be a sufficient notice, and therefore a surety is not released by failure of the creditor to sue.<sup>127</sup>

In addition to the failure to comply with the requirement that the county of the principal's residence be stated, the letters were further defective in that one of them was mailed to the creditor before the maturity of the debt, and contained merely the expression of a desire on the part of the indorser that the plaintiff would collect the obligation when it became due; and the other letter suggested the advisability of bringing suit, and expressed a doubt whether the plaintiff could make the money later if suit should be delayed, but gave notice to the creditor "to proceed to collect the same out of the principal."

<sup>126</sup> A notice by the surety on a contractor's indemnity bond, setting forth in full the bond, and concluding, "Now, therefore, the said Prescott National Bank is hereby notified to forthwith institute suit upon such contract," is such a notice as fulfils the condition of a statute providing that any person bound as a surety upon any contract for the payment of money or the performance of any act, when the right of action has accrued, may require by notice in writing the creditor or obligee forthwith to institute suit upon such contract. Prescott Nat. Bank v. Head (1907) 11 Ariz. 213, 90 Pac. 328, 21 Ann. Cas. 990.

A notice contained in a letter to the holder of the note, viz., "You are hereby notified that I don't want to stand longer as surety on the note given by . . . on which I am surety. You will therefore make your money," is held a sufficient notice. The court stated that "it shows the relation of principal and surety; that the

The statute provided that the sureties might require the creditor to institute proceedings on the contract, or to permit them to do so at their own costs in the creditor's name. It is stated to be very plain from the language of this statute that the action contemplated, which the sureties may require the creditor to institute, or to permit them to institute in his name, is upon the contract, and against the sureties as well as the principal. The principal debtor had died and his estate was being administered, and the sureties stated in their notice that they feared the estate would be insolvent, and asked the creditor to bring suit on the note and try to make it out of the estate before suing the sureties.

A request by a guarantor of a contract to pay for goods, in the language following: "I again notify and request you to begin suit against W. H. Peterson for the collection of the amount due for which I am his surety, or permit me to begin suit against him in your name at my costs," is not a sufficient notice under the Iowa statute. Moore v. Peterson (1884) 64 Iowa, 423, 20 N. W. 744.

But see Sullivan v. Dwyer (1897) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 42 S. W. 355, supra, note 108, where a notice to sue the principal and the other sureties was held sufficient.

name," the surety must notify the creditor to sue or permit him to do so, a notice to the creditor to collect the note not being sufficient; it being held to be within the discretion of the creditor to sue or permit the surety to sue.<sup>128</sup> Under this statute a letter which does not amount to a request to sue, unless the creditor authorized a named attorney to bring suit, is not sufficient.<sup>129</sup>

Inquiry as to the sufficiency of the notice has been denied upon the theory that the question was not properly raised by the pleadings.<sup>130</sup> The question of pleading has, however, not been considered generally in this note; it is assumed herein that the question is properly raised.

<sup>128</sup> Hill v. Sherman (1863) 15 Iowa, 365. Also send me copy of the bond with authority to sue the principal and sureties both." This was held to be no request to sue, unless the creditors authorized the attorney for the sureties to sue, a condition which it was held could not be attached to the notice.

Under statutes requiring the notice to be in writing, a verbal notice is insufficient.<sup>131</sup> Under a statute not expressly requiring a written notice, a verbal notice has been held sufficient.<sup>132</sup>

In jurisdictions in which the equitable rule is not recognized, a surety who has not given the written notice where that form of notice is required is not relieved, although the principal has become insolvent.<sup>133</sup> In jurisdictions in which the statutory rule is concurrent with the equitable rule, failure to give a written notice is not necessarily determinative against the release of the surety. He may rely on the equitable rule and be relieved on his oral notice,

In Lumsden v. Leonard (1875) 55 Ga. 374, an action in which a surety was seeking relief from a judgment obtained against the principal and himself on account of the failure of the creditor to levy upon real estate of the principal until the lien of the judgment had been lost, it is stated that it was not alleged that the creditor was notified in writing to levy, or that he was tendered the expenses of proceeding against the land, and in the absence of such averments no error was committed in striking this ground in the motion.

provided he is able to bring his case within the requirements of the equitable rule. It has been held, however, where the equitable remedy is concurrent with the statutory one, that in a court of law only the statutory remedy will be administered, and in order that this operate to discharge the surety notice must be given in the manner provided by statute.<sup>134</sup>

Parol evidence of the contents of the notice may be given upon a proper showing of the loss of the original.<sup>135</sup>

Waiver of written notice.

It has been held that the written notice required by statute may be waived by the party to whom such notice is required to be given.<sup>136</sup> It is the theory of these cases that the written notice is for the benefit of the creditor and, this being true, he may waive it. The statement by the creditor at the time of the giving of oral notice by the surety, and the offer by the surety to give a written notice, that he (the creditor) did not require a written notice, that a verbal notice was all that was necessary, and that he waived a written notice, he thereby expressly accepting the verbal notice, has been held to constitute a waiver, where the surety, relying thereon, did not give the written notice.<sup>137</sup> The acknowledgment of the notice, and the agreement to treat it as valid, and the promise to sue have been held to constitute a waiver.<sup>138</sup> But the mere promise of the creditor upon oral notice to sue, that he will do so, has been held not to constitute a waiver of the written notice.<sup>139</sup> Promise of the creditor as a waiver of the written notice must be distinguished from the promise as the basis of an estoppel against the creditor.<sup>140</sup> Failure

<sup>137</sup> Hamblin v. McCallister (Ky.) supra. The creditor in this case, at the time the oral notice was given and the offer made to give a written notice, stated: "I do not require a written notice. I waive a written notice. A verbal notice is all that is necessary." The court, after stating that this constituted a waiver of a written notice, stated further that the creditor is estopped to deny that the notice thus given and accepted was legal and sufficient or that the sureties were discharged by his failure to sue.

In Clark v. Osborn (Ohio) supra, the notice required suit to be brought on the note signed by the surety. In fact, the creditor held two notes against the same debtor signed by this surety to which the notice would apply indifferently. The creditor went to the surety's executors, who had given the notice, and, exhibiting the notes, said that he accepted the notice as applicable to both. He was urged to sue at once, and promised that he would without further notice commence an action forthwith against the principal debtor on both notes, and collect the same with due diligence. This was held to be a valid parol substitute for a formal notice. It is stated that the statute in a sense is a part of the contract, and the suretyship is accepted with knowledge of its terms; that it gives rights to both parties; that the right of the creditor L.R.A.1918C.

is to disregard with impunity any notice not in strict conformity to its terms; that this is his privilege and concerns him alone, and is unaffected by considerations of public policy; and that, like other personal privileges, it may be waived.

In English v. Bourn (1870) 7 Bush. (Ky.) 138, the surety claimed exoneration because of the failure of the creditor to sue after he had been told that he was wanted to sue, and that written notice would be given if he should require it, and had promised to sue. It is stated that there was no express and certain acceptance of the suggestion to sue as a substitute for an explicit and peremptory notice in writing, as was the case in Hamblin v. McCallister (Ky.) supra.

It was held that a mere promise did not constitute a waiver as a matter of law in Chrisman v. Tuttle (1877) 59 Ind. 156.

The fact that the agent of the holder upon whom the notice was served made no objection to its being verbal does not relieve the surety of his obligation to serve a written notice. Sapington v. Jeffries (1852) 15 Mo. 628. The allegation contained in the answer that the agent had accepted the notice as sufficient and had promised to sue, whereupon the surety took no further action, is not noticed in the opinion.

The effect of a promise by the creditor to sue, upon oral notice by the surety, was not considered in Miller v. Arnold (1879) 65 Ind. 488, holding the oral notice insufficient.

It is stated in Mendel v. Cairnes (1882) 84 Ind. 141, that the agreement of the creditor or obligee with the surety, that he will sue forthwith, must be shown to have been founded upon a new consideration, and not to have been a mere nudum pactum.

to object to the introduction of oral evidence showing the request is no waiver of the requirement that the notice shall be in writing.<sup>141</sup>

Some statutes expressly provide that the written notice can be waived only in writing. Under such a statute the promise of the creditor to sue upon oral notice being given him by the surety, and the bringing of an action which is subsequently dismissed, do not constitute a waiver of the written notice.<sup>142</sup>

(c) When notice must be served.

According to the usual form of statute, the notice must be given at or after the maturity of the instrument.<sup>143</sup>

As to when notice must be given with reference to the beginning of a term of court, under statutes requiring suit to be begun at the next term of court after notice is given, see infra.<sup>144</sup>

Under a statute authorizing the giving of notice when the surety "apprehends that his principal is about to become insolvent, or to remove permanently from the state without discharging the contract," it is not necessary for the surety to show, in order that he be released by the failure of the creditor to sue, that he did apprehend the insolvency or removal; the apprehension may not have been well grounded, or it may not have been for such cause as would create it in the minds of others.<sup>145</sup>

(d) By whom may notice be given.

A husband may in his own name give the written notice to the holder of a note on which his wife became surety before marriage, where he is liable for debts of the wife contracted before marriage.<sup>146</sup>

In the absence of any provision in the statute relating to the manner of service, the court has resorted to a general statutory provision relating to the manner of serving notice. Under such a general statutory provision, that notice may be served by "the proper officer or any other person," the surety has been held a proper person to serve the notice.<sup>147</sup>

Some statutes expressly provide that executors or administrators of a deceased surety may give the notice.<sup>148</sup>

See also III. b, 2 (f) infra, as to how notice may be served.

(e) To whom must notice be given.

The notice may be served upon the legal owner of the debt or demand; it is not necessary to search for equitable owners.<sup>149</sup>

E. 622 (the notice was given seven months before the note was due, and required the creditor to institute action upon it when it became due—statute provided for notice "when the right of action has accrued").

A notice given by the surety on a contractor's indemnity bond impliedly binding the contractor to discharge all material lien claims, while one such claim is disputed by the owner, is premature, although other claims have been satisfied by the owner, since successive suits cannot be required upon the bond, but the entire amounts due from the contractor must be determined before an action accrues on such bond. Prescott Nat. Bank v. Head (1907) 11 Ariz. 213, 90 Pac. 328, 21 Ann. Cas. 990.

And this is true although the lien claimant whose claim is in dispute is the surety on the contractor's bond. Prescott Nat. Bank v. Head (Ariz.) supra. Consequently, a failure to sue upon receipt of such notice does not release the surety.

It was accordingly held in this case that a special replication by the obligee in the bond in suit, to the defense of the surety that notice had been given and the creditor failed to sue, that another was the equitable or beneficial owner of the bond in suit, and that the creditor never was the owner of that bond, and that these facts were known to the surety, was insufficient.

to sue upon notice, it must be proved that such person held the note at the time of notice.<sup>150</sup>

A service upon the payee after he has transferred the note is insufficient; the notice must be served upon the person who, at the time of serving notice, is the holder of the instrument.<sup>151</sup> However, a mere delivery of the note in escrow, by the payee, to be delivered to a third person upon performance of certain conditions, vests neither title nor right of possession in such third person before performance of the conditions; the right to sue is in the original payee, and notice must be given to him.<sup>152</sup>

A notice is properly served by a surety on a note given to the administrator of a decedent's estate, upon the guardian of minor heirs of the decedent after the note has been turned over to such guardian upon distribution.<sup>153</sup>

Note pledged as collateral.

One holding a note as collateral security is the proper person upon whom to serve the notice to sue.<sup>154</sup> This rule has been applied in various situations. One holding a note as collateral security with instructions to apply the proceeds of it when collected to the payment of the demand against the owner is held to be the proper person to whom notice to sue should be given, under a statute authorizing the surety on a note to require "the holder thereof to proceed to collect the same."<sup>155</sup> Some cases have made the test, the right of the holder of collateral security to sue on the obligation; if he has the right to sue, he is held to be the proper person on whom to serve notice; if he has not such right, he is held not to be the proper person.<sup>156</sup> On the contrary, the fact that the holder of collateral security may not have authority to sue has been held not to change the rule; he is still held to be the proper person upon whom to serve notice.<sup>157</sup>

Service upon an agent.

Under a statute requiring the notice to be served upon the person having the right of action, an attorney for the party is not a proper person upon whom to serve notice,<sup>158</sup> even though suit has been begun against the sureties on the obligation and the attorney advises his client of the notice.<sup>159</sup> A notice directed to the attorney for county commission-

<sup>155</sup> McCrary v. King (1859) 27 Ga. 26. It is here stated that the instructions by the owner of the note to his creditor, to whom it was given as collateral security, to apply the proceeds of it when collected to the payment of the demand against the owner, made such creditor the legal as well as the actual holder, and he was the only person who had the right to bring suit upon it.

But the payee of a note who had pledged the same as collateral security was held by the trial court to be the proper person upon whom to serve notice after the debt for which the note was collateral had been paid, so that it again belonged to the payee, although it seems he did not have possession. German American Bank v. Denmire (Iowa) supra. There is no discussion nor holding on this question in the supreme court.

And see Carhart v. Wynn, infra, note 162.

v. Hampton (1846) 8 Ala. 942, authorized the surety to require in writing "his creditor . . . to put the bond, bill, or note . . . in suit, and unless the creditor so required" shall within a reasonable time begin suit, the surety shall be discharged. Whether this statute was in force at the time of the decision in Pickens v. Yarborough is not certain. In the subsequent case of Savage v. Carleton (1859) 33 Ala. 443, a statute is set out which provides that the surety may require "the creditor or anyone having the beneficial interest in the contract" to sue.

<sup>159</sup> Cummins v. Garretson (1854) 15 Ark. 132. The statute involved in this case required the person having the right of action upon the obligation, upon notice from the surety, forthwith to commence suit against "the principal debtor and the other party liable." It was for the purpose of requiring suit against the principal debtor that the notice was served in this case after a suit had been begun against the sureties alone. Although the statute provided that certain notices during the progress of a suit may be served upon the party or his attorney of record, it is stated that, in the absence of any positive regulation of law, there is no authority for holding that notices of this description can be effectually given to the attorney before or during the progress of a suit, so as to be notice to the ers, directing him to bring suit upon a bond, is not a notice sufficient under a statute which requires a notice to the creditor or obligee.<sup>160</sup>

It has been held that an agent for the collection of the note is not a proper person upon whom to serve notice, even while he has the instrument in his possession, where he has no authority to sue.<sup>161</sup> The owner of the note is not bound by such notice, even though the agent afterwards, upon returning the same, informs him of the notice.<sup>162</sup> It has been held, where the evidence as to the agency of the person upon whom the notice was served was conflicting, that it cannot be said, even if it is admitted that such person told the holder of the note of the notice, that the requirement of the statute providing that a notice in writing shall be given has been met.<sup>163</sup>

<sup>162</sup> Carhart v. Wynn (Ga.) supra. The note was returned, however, after the expiration of the period fixed by statute for suit to be brought.

That notice served upon a guardian of minor heirs, who were the owners of the note, is sufficient, see Overturf v. Martin (Ind.) supra.

In McNeilly v. Cooksey (1878) 2 Lea (Tenn.) 39, the surety notified the constable at the time the summons was served in an action brought by the creditor, that he was surety on the note, and told the constable to proceed to collect it as soon as possible. It is stated by the court that if a constable who is the agent of the plaintiff for the collection of the debt can, by anything the debtor may say to him, be turned into an agent of the plaintiff for any other purposes touching the debt, so that notice of the defendant's wishes will be notice to the creditor, the evidence fails to show that the defendant required active diligence on the part of the creditor, or requested the officer to notify the creditor of his wishes.

<sup>163</sup> Bartlett v. Cunningham (1877) 85 Ill. 22. The theory of this case is not altogether clear. After referring to the conflicting evidence, the court states: "Whether any notice was ever served upon appellee [the holder of the note], or whether he was notified to institute suit upon the note, were questions purely of fact for the jury." The court then states that, the evidence being conflicting, the finding of the jury for the holder of the note against the surety would not be disturbed. Farther on in the L.R.A.1918C.

A notice addressed to and intended for the husband of the holder of the note is not sufficient, although communicated to the wife, under a statute authorizing a person bound as surety to "require his creditor, by notice in writing, to commence an action on such instrument forthwith against the principal debtor."<sup>164</sup> But a notice upon the wife of the holder of the note at his residence, while he was temporarily absent, with a request to her to deliver the notice to the holder, has been held sufficient, especially where a few days afterwards the surety informed the holder of his leaving such notice and of its contents and purport, and the holder did not object at the time either to the sufficiency of the notice or to the manner of its service.<sup>165</sup>

opinion the court states that the holder of the note may have been told by the alleged agent that the surety desired the note sued. "But," the court continues, "such fact will not release appellant [the surety]. If he in good faith desired suit upon the note,—which, however, would have availed nothing, as Deatherage [the principal debtor] was insolvent when the note was given, and continued in the same condition,—he should have prepared a notice in writing, in duplicate, and delivered it, in the presence of a witness, to appellee in person. Had this course been pursued, appellant would have been in a position to rely upon the defense given by the statute."

<sup>164</sup> Moormann v. Voss (1907) 77 Ohio St. 270, 83 N. E. 76. It is stated that it was neither averred nor proved that the husband was constituted the agent of the wife to accept and receive for her this notice, nor was it claimed that he was constituted the agent of the surety to deliver the notice to her. At the time of communicating the notice, the husband, who was an attorney, advised his wife that the same was not a notice to her, and that she need pay no attention to it whatever.

See McCoy v. Lockwood (Ind.) infra.

<sup>165</sup> McCoy v. Lockwood, (1880) 71 Ind. 319. A statute provided that the written admission of a party which states the time and place of service shall be proof of service. In this case the agreed statement of facts contained the admission of the creditor that the surety left at his residence at a stated time in the hands of his wife, during his temporary absence from home, a notice in writing forthwith to institute an action upon the note. It was stated that this was a legal and valid service upon the creditor of the notice in writing referred to. After reciting his failure to make objections to the service, it was further stated that he must be taken to have waived any objection to such notice either as to its sufficiency or to the manner of its service.

tice after action has accrued requiring the "person having such right of action" to bring suit within a stated time, a notice served upon the clerk of the trustees of a bank to whom the note is payable is not sufficient, although the clerk communicated it to one of the trustees.<sup>166</sup>

A notice to the treasurer of a board of school trustees, by the surety on a note payable to the trustees, is not sufficient to discharge the surety, although the treasurer's duties are to loan moneys, collect and safely keep funds, and discharge other duties, if the board of trustees exercises a supervisory power over him.<sup>167</sup>

Notice to a sheriff to proceed in the collection of a note given in payment of a fine does not discharge the surety where the sheriff has no authority to enforce obligations to the county.<sup>168</sup>

Several creditors.

A service of the notice on one of two payees of a note is insufficient, and the surety is not released by the failure to bring suit within the time designated by statute; the notice must be served upon all the obligees named in the instrument.<sup>169</sup> The fact, however, that notice has been served upon only one of several administrators of a deceased creditor's estate has been held not to render it invalid.<sup>170</sup>

(f) How notice may be served.

Under some statutes there must be personal service of the notice.<sup>171</sup> Under a statute requiring the notice in writing to be "served in person," there is no service of notice shown as required, where the surety claims to have mailed a letter to the creditor, which the creditor denies receiving, and there is no testimony showing that the letter was received other than the fact of mailing.<sup>172</sup> It has been held that a letter, although received by the creditor, is not sufficient.<sup>173</sup>

It is not necessary that an officer or third person give the notice; the surety may himself do so;<sup>174</sup> nor is it necessary

<sup>166</sup> Adams v. Roane (1847) 7 Ark. 360. It is stated that the record did not contain any information as to how far the clerk was authorized to waive or control the rights of the trustees, and the court was not at liberty to take judicial notice of any such power. It is further stated that, since the note was made payable to the trustees, the clerk cannot be said to have the right of action; that a notice to him, although communicated to one of the trustees, cannot be said to be a service upon the trustee in accordance with the statute.

<sup>167</sup> Trustees of Schools v. Southard (1889) 31 Ill. App. 359. The transaction in which the note was given for borrowed money was had with the treasurer. After reviewing the duties of the treasurer and the supervisory power exercised by the board of trustees over such official, the court states that these are matters of public law of which all persons must take notice; that the surety should have given notice to each agent of the public who had the right or duty under the law to direct the collection of the note,—the treasurer and the board of trustees.

The treasurer cannot be regarded as the agent of the board of trustees. Ibid.

Watkins* (1845) 6 Ark. 123, the statute in this state is set out, and from that opinion it appears that it provides that any person bound as security for another in any bond, bill, or note for the payment of money or delivery of property may, at any time after action has accrued thereon, by a notice in writing, require the person having such right of action forthwith to commence suit.

<sup>171</sup> Conway v. Campbell (1889) 38 Mo. App. 473. A statute providing that "the notice required above shall be served by delivering a copy thereof to the person having the right of action on the instrument, or leaving a copy at his usual place of abode with some person of the family over the age of fifteen years," was held to require a personal service, and a notice sent through the mails, although it may have been received by the creditor, would not be sufficient.

In a statement contained in the opinion in Sapington v. Jeffries (1852) 15 Mo. 628, it is said that the service of the notice is required by statute to be on the person having the right of action on the instrument personally, or by leaving a copy at his usual place of residence with some white person of the family over the age of fifteen years.

that such a notice should be served by an officer or by a disinterested party and a return made.<sup>175</sup>

The service of one of duplicate notices is sufficient under a statute providing that notice shall be served by delivering a "copy" thereof to the person having the right of action on the instrument.<sup>176</sup> In fact, it has been held not necessary for the surety to retain a copy of the notice.<sup>177</sup>

Some statutes require the party pleading the notice to prove service of notice by two witnesses. Under a statute so requiring, it is necessary that the required number of witnesses prove the notice, although it is shown by the principal debtor that the creditor, in demanding of him payment of the note, stated that he had been requested to sue.<sup>178</sup> But it has been held that a surety may be relieved in a proper case by virtue of the equitable rule, although he is not able to prove his notice by two witnesses.<sup>179</sup>

(g) Waiver of effect of notice.

The notice may be waived or revoked by the surety after it has been given, and if it has been waived by him the failure of the creditor to sue does not release the surety. Asking indulgence after notice to sue has been given is a waiver or revocation of the notice, provided the time at which the surety asked the indulgence was before the expiration of the time within which suit must be brought, and provided the indulgence was asked not for himself, but for the principal debtor.<sup>180</sup> A request by the surety not to sue before he has been released by the failure of the creditor to sue within the required time after a notice was given by the surety relieves the creditor of the obligation to sue.<sup>181</sup>

But if the request not to sue is made after the surety is released, the surety's liability is not reinstated.<sup>182</sup>

But it has been held where, at the time of serving notice, the surety requested the creditor to see the debtor before suing and induce him to pay a part of or all the money if possible, that a written notice to the creditor that he need not sue, given after the expiration of the statutory period, precludes the surety from taking advantage of the notice to sue, where the notice not to sue was treated as a waiver of the notice to sue by both parties.<sup>183</sup>

The consent by the surety to the dismissal of the suit begun by the creditor operates as a waiver of the notice, and the surety continues bound by his contract.<sup>184</sup>

<sup>175</sup> Weir v. Dicker (1889) 11 Ky. L. Rep. 523. The statute provided that the notice shall be served by "delivering a copy thereof" to the person having the right of action on the instrument. It is stated that there is nothing in this section which makes it necessary that the surety shall retain a copy of the notice served on the payee; such a notice cannot be likened to a summons, for that is a court record and contains a sheriff's return. The statute goes no further than to require a written notice.

In a note to Waterford v. Hensley (1827) Mart. & Y. (Tenn.) 275, it is stated to have held in this state that service of the notice proved by one witness and an acknowledgment by the creditor of such service proved by a second witness, constitute a substantial compliance with the statute.

<sup>181</sup> Rotting v. Cleman (1898) 20 Wash. 116, 54 Pac. 935. This question is not squarely decided in this case. The reply of the creditor to the defense that he had failed to sue upon notice was that, after the notice was given, the surety instructed him not to sue upon the note, and that the surety also instructed the one who had held the note for collection not to sue upon the note. It was contended that this reply was insufficient to constitute a defense or waiver of the notice pleaded in the answer, but the court determined that the allegation was sufficient to warrant the proof as to when the notice not to sue was given. It was held that this notice not to sue was given before the surety had been relieved by a failure of the creditor to begin suit, and therefore his liability was continued.

In Gillilan v. Ludington (1873) 6 W. Va. 128, a replication setting up notice by the surety not to sue immediately after giving the original notice was sustained.

The insertion in the notice of information to the effect that the principal debtor had made an assignment to an assignee who was "authorized by law to hear and render judgment for claims of creditors" does not nullify the requirement that suit be commenced forthwith.<sup>185</sup>

As to waiver of the benefits of the statute, see infra, III. b, 15.

3. Who must be sued.

Under a statute authorizing the surety to give notice in writing to the creditor, and requiring the creditor forthwith to put the obligation in suit without expressly specifying against whom the suit is to be brought, a suit against the surety alone has been held not to be sufficient.<sup>186</sup> So, under a statute empowering any person bound as surety for another for the payment of money or the performance of any other contract, after a right of action has accrued on the contract, to require the creditor "to sue upon the same, or to permit the surety to commence suit in such creditor's name and at the surety's cost," it has been held that, even assuming a claim filed against the surety's estate is a suit within the meaning of this statute, it is not a suit against the principal, and is therefore insufficient.<sup>187</sup>

But under a similar statute requiring the creditor, upon written notice after the maturity of the claim, "forthwith to put the bond, bill, or note . . . in suit," without specifying against whom the suit shall be brought, it has been held not necessary for the creditor to sue the debtor; he may sue the surety alone, especially where another section of the statute provides for the surety obtaining judgment against the debtor at the same time that judgment is obtained against him; the surety cannot therefore insist upon the failure of the creditor to sue the debtor as releasing him under the statute.<sup>188</sup>

A statutory provision, independent of the one empowering the surety by notice to require the creditor to sue, providing that persons severally liable upon the same obligation "may all or any of them be included in the same action at the option of the plaintiff," has been held to authorize the payee of a note, at his option, to bring suit against a surety who had given him notice to sue the maker and sureties, without joining the maker and other sureties.<sup>189</sup>

The action need not be brought against the surety giving the notice, nor a non-resident cosurety, if it is brought against the principal.<sup>190</sup>

<sup>186</sup> Starling v. Buttles (1826) 2 Ohio, 303. The statute is not set out in the opinion, but the substance is given in the language of the court as above stated. In coming to the conclusion at which the court arrived, it is stated that the object of the act is plainly to enable sureties to compel a creditor, when his debt is due, to pursue the principal debtor by a suit, or exonerate the surety; that if, upon receiving notice, it would be sufficient to sue the surety alone, the object of the law would be evaded. Consequently, a separate suit against the surety without any suit against the principal was held not a compliance with either the letter or spirit of the law.

It seems that the statute was subsequently changed so that the creditor might be required to commence his action against the principal debtor on such note. See Illiff v. Weymouth (1883) 40 Ohio St. 101; Clark v. Osborn (1884) 41 Ohio St. 28.

A statute involved in Central Bank & T. Co. v. Hill (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 160 S. W. 1099, excused a suit against the principal obligor in certain cases. A case which came within the exception was held not to require suit against the principal obligor; otherwise the suit must be brought against all the parties to whom the person making the request stands in the attitude of surety, under a statute merely requiring suit to be instituted forthwith upon the contract.

<sup>188</sup> Scott v. Bradford (1837) 5 Port. (Ala.) 443. The debtor had moved from his former residence, but still resided in the state, and the place of his residence was known. Another statute involved in this case made all joint obligations joint and several, and provided for suit against one or more of the obligors. The Alabama statute was subsequently changed so that a suit against the debtor was required.

<sup>190</sup> Perry v. Barret (1853) 18 Mo. 140. At the time the notice was given, a suit was instituted and pending against all the parties liable on the note. A cosurety of the surety giving the notice resided out of the limits of the state, and he was not served with process. The action resulted in a judgment against the principal debtor and a return upon the execution of nulla bona. It was discontinued as to the surety giving the notice and as to the cosurety who was not served. It is stated that it is not an important advantage to the surety giving the notice that he himself should be included in the action as defendant, and should have a judgment rendered against him, for, in the action brought against the other parties, the creditor, in order to hold the notifying surety bound, must proceed with diligence to collect the money.

And it has been stated that a suit against the principal debtor and the sureties other than the one giving the notice is a sufficient compliance with a demand to proceed against such parties.<sup>191</sup>

Where the creditor is excused from suing the principal for some reason discussed in III. b, 6, infra, it is the theory of some courts that no suit need be brought even against the surety; that the surety can pay the debt without suit, and he himself proceed against the principal debtor.<sup>192</sup>

As to right to require suit against principal alone under equitable rule, see supra.<sup>193</sup>

4. When suit must be brought.

Some statutory provisions fix a definite time in which suit must be brought or the surety released. Other statutes do not fix a definite time. In the statutes which do not fix a definite time, the requirements as to when suit must be brought vary widely. Some require the suit to be brought "forthwith" after the notice; others at the first term of court after the notice; others within a reasonable time. These various provisions will be discussed in detail.

Under statutes requiring a suit to be brought within a "reasonable time" or "within a reasonable time and with due diligence," the question of what amounts to a reasonable time cannot be answered in any general way. The delay may be so great as to make it apparent from the mere time element that the suit was not commenced within a reasonable time. A delay of fourteen months discharges the surety.<sup>194</sup> A delay of three years discharges the surety.<sup>195</sup> An action brought after such a delay is not an action brought within a reasonable time. A suit begun after a delay of a less period than these has been held not to have been begun in a reasonable time.<sup>196</sup>

A delay of one month after notice was given has been held not to be unreasonable, so that the direction by the surety at the end of that time, not to sue, relieved the creditor from the duty to sue, and held the surety without a new consideration.<sup>197</sup>

The time element is frequently combined with other elements. From these cases no general rule can be deduced. Examples are given in the footnote.<sup>198</sup>

A question has also arisen where it appears that suit was promptly begun by the creditor, as to whether it was begun in the right court. As to this question, see III. b, 5, infra.

That no suit need be brought seems to be the theory of Thompson v. Treller (1907) 82 Ark. 247, 101 S. W. 174.

In Conklin v. Conklin (1876) 54 Ind. 289, where there was a delay of three years in suing, the court states that the surety cannot complain that he was not sued sooner.

<sup>194</sup> Root v. Dill (1871) 38 Ind. 169. The Indiana statute empowers a surety to require by notice in writing the creditor or obligee "forthwith to institute an action upon the contract," and provides that, if the action is not brought "within a reasonable time" thereafter, the surety shall be discharged.

It is stated obiter in Conklin v. Conklin (Ind.) supra, that a delay of over three years discharges the surety, but as the principal debtor was out of the state the failure of the creditor to sue was held excused. It was held that the surety could not under these circumstances complain of a delay of three years.

<sup>196</sup> A finding of the trial court, as a conclusion of law, that the creditor, a Connecticut corporation, did not bring its suit, against the debtor, a resident of Ohio, within a reasonable time after notice, in bringing it three months and six days from the time of notice, was sustained in Meriden Silver Plate Co. v. Flory (1886) 44 Ohio St. 430, 7 N. E. 753. The statute involved in this case required the action to be commenced within a reasonable time after the notice.

<sup>198</sup> A suit brought ten months after the notice was served does not show such diligence as the law requires in bringing a suit, where it appears that a term of court was held in the county of the debtor's residence about one month after the notice was given, and court was held in the county where the other parties reside about seven months after the giving of the notice. Overturf v. Martin (1851) 2 Ind. 507.

The jury here had found against the creditor on all issues of fact, and it is stated that the facts fully sustained the finding. Whether the question as to the suit having been brought in a reasonable time was left to the jury as an issue of fact does not appear. It is stated further that, even if it was not incumbent on the creditor to go to the county where the principal debtor resided, he should have at least brought suit at the next succeeding term of the court in the county where the remaining parties resided.

necessary, to the release of a surety under the ordinary form of statute, that he has been injured by the delay through the insolvency of the principal debtor or the placing of his property beyond the reach of process. The fact that the property of the principal debtor has been taken on execution on other judgments, or has been placed beyond the reach of process in some other way, is a fact, however, that has been taken into consideration in determining what is a reasonable time to sue.<sup>199</sup>

The fact that a suit was brought erroneously and dismissed has been held to be no evidence of diligence;<sup>200</sup> but it has been stated that, if the creditor brought any other action, which for any cause failed, this matter might be shown by way of replication.<sup>201</sup>

Under a statute requiring suit to be brought to the first court to which suit can be brought after the receipt of the notice, a suit is brought if the summons is returnable at such term, although there may not be time for the defendant to put in his plea so that the case may stand for trial at that term.<sup>202</sup> Some statutes require the suit to be brought at the next term of court after the notice is given.<sup>203</sup> The fact that the principal debtor is out of the state excuses the creditor from bringing suit to the first term of court to which suit could be brought after notice, as required by statute; according to the case holding to this theory, the surety may at once pay the debt and follow the principal and enforce his remedy against him.<sup>204</sup>

Under statutes prescribing a definite time in which the suit must be brought, a creditor who has brought his suit within the required time is not guilty of such laches as will discharge a surety because, by bringing his suit at one city in which a circuit court was held, the summons was returnable one week later than it would have been had he commenced his suit at another city in the same county, where a term of circuit court was also held.<sup>205</sup>

A surety has been held not released on the theory that there was no prosecution with due diligence, where the suit was begun two days after the notice was served, although the summons was made returnable beyond the statutory period for the beginning of the suit; but it appeared that two of the defendants lived in different townships from that of the justice before whom the suit was brought, and nothing was given in evidence tending to show that the creditor had caused the return day of the summons to be set for a time later than was necessary for service on the defendant, and the return day was within the time allowed by law.<sup>206</sup>

<sup>199</sup> Under a statute providing the surety may, when he thinks his principal is likely to become insolvent and after a right of action has accrued on the contract on which he is surety, give notice in writing to the creditor to sue on the contract, and providing that, unless such creditor shall "within a reasonable time and with due diligence commence suit thereon and prosecute the same to final judgment, the surety shall be discharged," a surety is discharged where the creditor failed to bring suit for thirty-six days after the notice, it being shown that twenty-five days after the notice the debtor sold property belonging to him and paid judgments which were liens thereon, and money was made from him on execution. Miller v. Gray (1889) 31 Ill. App. 453.

<sup>202</sup> Guttery v. Pickett (1899) 125 Ala. 434, 27 So. 840. The notice was given a sufficient length of time before the next term of court to begin the action, and service was had the requisite time before the term, although the cause could not stand for trial at that term. The creditor delayed about a month after notice. L.R.A.1918C.

<sup>203</sup> In Weir v. Dicker (1889) 11 Ky. L. Rep. 523, a surety was held released by the failure of a creditor to sue at the next term after he was notified by the surety that he must sue, although the notice was given only three days before the term commenced. It is stated that, as all the parties lived in the county and within 3 miles of the courthouse, three days were ample time in which to sue.

It was apparently under such a statute that it was held in Gutzwiller v. Wagner (1881) 3 Ky. L. Rep. 470, that notice by a surety to the obligee to sue must be given in time to enable him to obtain judgment at the next term of court after the notice was given. Only an abstract of this case appears. In this abstract it is stated that "notice given more than ten days before the beginning of the term was not sufficient in this case." What is meant by this statement is problematical.

But if the suit is not begun within the statutory period, the surety is discharged, even though the suit is not begun because of the neglect of the justice whom the creditor ordered to bring suit; the creditor must not only direct the institution of the suit, but must see that it is actually commenced within the time fixed by statute.<sup>207</sup>

Diligence in pursuing.

The creditor must under some statutes proceed "with due diligence" after suit is brought, "in the ordinary course of law, to judgment and execution." Under such a statute a creditor who commences suit upon notice, against the debtor and surety, but who, upon the writ against the debtor, which has been sent to another county where the debtor resided, not being returned, dismisses his suit as to the debtor and takes judgment against the surety alone, has not proceeded with due diligence.<sup>208</sup> It has been held where a suit of which the justices' court has concurrent jurisdiction with the circuit court was brought in the justices' court, which could not issue a summons to another county, that dismissing the suit against the debtor was not proceeding with due diligence, and the surety was discharged.<sup>209</sup>

But under a statute requiring the creditor to use due diligence in prosecuting suit "to judgment, and by execution," a creditor who has obtained judgment in a reasonable time is not guilty of laches relieving the surety, where upon demand the clerk refused to issue execution upon the belief that he was prohibited from so doing by a stay law, whereupon the creditor sought the interposition of a court to compel the issuance of the execution and was refused relief.<sup>210</sup>

It is stated generally in one case that a statute requiring a creditor to sue and to prosecute his suit with due diligence to judgment and by execution, upon receiving notice from the surety to sue, "does not require the creditor to pursue the principal's estate in equity, to impeach alleged fraudulent conveyances, or to subject an equity of the principal to the payment of his debt, or, in a word, to exhaust his remedies against the principal before he can have satisfaction out of the estate of the surety."<sup>210</sup>

5. Where suit must be brought.

A question has been raised in a suit which was begun promptly by the creditor after receiving notice, as to whether he had a choice of courts where more than one court was available. It has been held to be the duty of the creditor to bring the suit in the court the term of which is thereafter first to convene.<sup>211</sup> On the

<sup>207</sup> In German American Bank v. Denmire (1882) 58 Iowa, 137, 12 N. W. 237, the surety had attempted to bring suit himself without requesting the holder of the note to do so. But subsequently, on advice of counsel, he served the creditor with the statutory notice and at the same time wrote the justice before whom the suit was to be brought not to bring suit in his behalf. It was urged that the surety, by writing the justice not to bring suit in his behalf, prevented the justice from obeying the direction given by the creditor to begin suit; but this contention was denied.

<sup>208</sup> Peters v. Linenschmidt (1874) 58 Mo. 464. It is stated to have been the duty of the creditor under the above circumstances, upon his failure to obtain service on the principal debtor at the first term, to take an alias summons returnable to the second term, and then, under the provisions of a statute, if service was not had on the debtor, the creditor would have been entitled to judgment against the surety unless the surety consented to a further delay.

justices' court he chose not to sue the principal debtor at all. It is further stated that the creditor, having at his election two tribunals in his county equally convenient and remedial to himself, one of which would enable him to protect the surety as contemplated by the statute, and the other would not, should, upon the plainest principles of fair dealing and equity, have selected the forum which would enable him to respect the notice given him by the surety and execute the object of the statute.

<sup>211</sup> Craft v. Dodd (1860) 15 Ind. 380. The creditor began his suit immediately after notice, but not in the court the term of which commenced at the earliest day. An answer setting up this fact was held to make a prima facie defense for the surety, against which a demurrer was not good, although the surety did not allege that he suffered any injury from the suit having been thus begun.

See Overturf v. Martin supra, note 198.

See Sisk v. Rosenberger (1884) 82 Mo. 46, supra, note 209.

See Collum v. Fahrner (1899) 83 Mo. App. 110, supra, note 205.

contrary, the creditor has been held to have a discretion as to the court in which to bring suit under such circumstances.<sup>212</sup>

Where the principal debtor resides in a county other than that of the residence of the creditor and surety, and a notice to sue is given by the surety, the failure of the creditor to begin a suit in the county of the residence of the principal debtor, where a term of court in which the cause could be prosecuted was then in session, has been held to be a failure to proceed within a reasonable time, although the creditor began his action in the county of his residence and that of the surety within two days from the service of the notice, but the term of the court in such county was not held until a little over two months after the notice was served.<sup>213</sup>

6. Excuses for failure to sue.

The creditor cannot be compelled to go out of the state to sue the debtor; consequently, his failure to sue upon notice by the surety is excused where the debtor is absent from the state.<sup>214</sup> This rule has been followed where the debtor is absent from the state and has left no available property in the state.<sup>215</sup> It has been held that the creditor is excused from joining <sup>212</sup> In Robertson v. Angle (1903) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 76 S. W. 317, where there were two courts with jurisdiction of the cause, it is stated that the creditor had the right to select the court in which to bring her suit. She brought it in the district court, the term of which did not begin for three months after suit was brought, while a term of the county court began about ten days after notice was given. A statute required ten days' service before the first day of the term in order to compel the defendant to plead at the return day. The court concluded that the creditor used due diligence in employing attorneys and beginning the suit. The decision in this case, however, denying relief to the surety, seems to rest largely upon the fact that the debtor was insolvent at the time of notice, and it was held that, this being true, suit was not necessary.

<sup>214</sup> Rowe v. Buchtel (1859) 13 Ind. 381. The creditor here failed to sue at the first term of court after receiving notice, but at the second term thereafter he sued the surety. The surety defended on the ground that he himself had not been sued at the first term after the notice; but this was held not a valid defense, it being stated that the notice to sue did not operate as a requirement to sue the surety.

Conklin v. Conklin (1876) 54 Ind. 289. The Indiana statute required merely that action be brought on the instrument. It is stated in Rowe v. Buchtel, that the debtor left no property and never had any administrator in the state. Nothing is said about property in Conklin v. Conklin, where the rule was applied nevertheless. A further reason is advanced in the Conklin case for the rule; that is, that, where the common law prevails unmodified by statute, a judgment against one of several joint debtors merges the cause of action, and the others cannot be afterwards sued, and therefore if the creditor were to follow his principal into another jurisdiction and there obtain a several judgment against him, the judgment might bar an action against the surety, though the principal were utterly insolvent and the judgment never paid.

13 Ohio C. C. 675, 6 Ohio C. D. 682. Suit was brought against the surety, but when does not appear.

The answer of a surety to an action against him on a joint and several note, that the principal debtor had died leaving an ample estate for the payment of all debts, and that he had given the holder of the note notice in writing to forthwith institute an action upon the note, and that the holder failed to institute the action, is bad, since, conceding, without deciding, that a creditor may be required to pursue the estate of a deceased principal in order to preserve the liability of the surety, he cannot be required to go out of the state to sue the principal. The answer, not having made it appear where the principal debtor had died, or where the estate was situated, is therefore bad, there being held to be no presumption that he died within the state, nor that his estate or any part of it was situated in the state. Whittlesey v. Heberer (1874) 48 Ind. 260.

It was proved in Conklin v. Conklin (Ind.) supra, that when the notice was served on the creditor he said to the person serving it, "Tell Newton that will be all right." This statement was urged as an estoppel, but the court, stating that it did not appear that the surety did anything or parted with anything or in any manner changed his situation in consequence of the message thus sent to him, said that there were none of the elements of estoppel; that by this message the creditor meant to give the surety to understand that he would comply with the notice by bringing suit, but, as he was not bound to bring an action out of the state, the message did not bind him to do it.

As to necessity of suing a nonresident surety, see Perry v. Barret (1853) 18 Mo. 140, supra, note 190.

<sup>215</sup> Thompson v. Teller (1907) 82 Ark. 247, 101 S. W. 174. The Arkansas statute set out in Sims v. Everett, ante, 7, is apparently not the full statute relating to this matter. In Hall v. Equitable Surety Co. (1917) 126 Ark. 535, 101 S. W. 32, it appears that the creditor is required to commence suit against "the principal debtor and other party liable."

the debtor if he did not know, nor could have known in the exercise of due diligence, that the debtor resided within the state.<sup>216</sup>

It was urged in one case in which the creditor as well as the principal debtor was a nonresident of the state in which the contract was entered into, and the law of which governed the same, that the rule excusing suit because of nonresidence did not apply; this contention was denied. The court stated: "We do not perceive that the residence of the plaintiff [creditor] has anything to do with the question. The contracts were Indiana contracts and governed by the Indiana law, wherever the parties to them might reside." Accordingly, the surety was held not discharged by failure of the creditor to sue where the principal debtor was a nonresident.<sup>217</sup>

A plea of a surety setting up a discharge because of the failure of the creditor to sue after notice, which admitted the death of the debtor and failed to show that it did not occur so soon after the service of the notice as to prevent the bringing of an action, and also failed to show that the debtor left in the county or state any estate on which administration had been or could be granted, has been held bad as a defense to an action against the surety.<sup>218</sup>

It has been held that the creditor is not compelled to go to a distant county in the state to sue the debtor, even under a statute requiring suit against the principal debtor and the surety, but that he may sue the surety alone in the county where he and the surety reside.<sup>219</sup>

But under a statute which gives the creditor the option to bring suit himself or permit the surety to do so, the fact of nonresidence at the time of notice is no excuse for the failure of the creditor either to bring suit or permit the surety to do so.<sup>220</sup>

The nonresidence of the creditor does not excuse him from complying with the requirements of the statute.<sup>221</sup> But if the debtor is a nonresident, the creditor is excused from suing him, although the creditor is a nonresident.<sup>222</sup>

The fact that the debtor is out of the state excuses the creditor from bringing suit at the first term of court after notice is served.<sup>223</sup>

The disturbed condition of Missouri during the year 1861 is no excuse for the creditor not bringing suit within the required time after service of notice upon him by the surety, where it appears that a court of common pleas in a county in which he could have sued was open to him.<sup>224</sup>

Insolvency of debtor.

Under the ordinary statute the suit must be brought whether the debtor is solvent or insolvent;<sup>225</sup> it is the privilege of the surety to require suit to be

A surety is not relieved by the failure of the creditor to bring suit on the obligation within the stated time after notice is served, where the principal debtor is a nonresident of the state, and the notice requires merely that suit be commenced against the principal debtor. Phillips v. Riley (1858) 27 Mo. 386. The action here was begun, after the expiration of the statutory period, against the principal and surety, but was discontinued as to the nonresident principal debtor.

The sureties on an attachment bond cannot require the obligee therein to begin suit where the principals on the bond were nonresidents, and it is not made to appear that they had any property in the state liable to attachment. *Seattle Crockery Co. v. 7. Applicability in case of death or incompetency of principal debtor.

A statute empowering the surety to give notice to the creditor to sue, and providing that upon the failure of the creditor to comply within a stated time the surety shall be discharged, has been held to have no application to a case in which the principal debtor died prior to the time of the service of notice;<sup>227</sup> nor to a case in which the principal debtor died during the currency of the thirty days limited for the institution of the suit.<sup>228</sup> These decisions are based upon a principle that makes it immaterial whether or not a personal representative has been appointed.<sup>229</sup>

But it has been held that, if a personal representative of the deceased debtor's estate has been appointed, the statute applies, and the surety is released by failure to bring suit after notice.<sup>230</sup>

A statute empowering the surety to require, by notice in writing, the creditor forthwith to institute a suit upon the contract, has been held not to apply in the case of an insane principal debtor under guardianship.<sup>231</sup> The court argues that it is clear such a statute contemplates a principal amenable to suit forthwith, "while, under the circumstances of this case, the law would not have permitted appellant [the creditor] to proceed directly against the principal, but it would have been incumbent upon the appellant to file a claim with the guardian, and in no event could a suit have been brought unless the claim had been disallowed by the guardian or disapproved by the court, and then suit would have to be against the guardian, and not against the principal."

8. Applicability in case of death of surety.

Such statutes as are under discussion in this note apply where the surety has died; the notice required by statute may

On the contrary, it has been held that suit need not be brought where the debtor is insolvent at time of notice. Robertson v. Angle (1903) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 76 S. W. 317. The court relies on some New York cases decided under the equitable rule discussed supra. Also some Texas cases are cited which deal with another question. Apparently, the court in Bumpus v. Lovejoy (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 196 S. W. 631, was of the opinion that insolvency of the principal excused suit.

It will be observed by reference to the discussion of the equitable rule above that a release under that rule is based upon the fact that the principal debtor became insolvent after notice, so that insolvency at the time of notice, under that rule, excused suit.

<sup>227</sup> Hickam v. Hollingsworth (1853) 17 Mo. 475. In the course of the opinion it is stated that it may often turn out that more than thirty days (the time given by the statute in which to sue) may elapse after the death of the obligor before administration is granted on his estate; in such case notice to sue given a few days before the death must be entirely nugatory.

The general question of the effect of failure to present claim against the estate of a deceased or bankrupt principal, to release surety, is discussed in the note to Yerxa v. Ruthruff, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 139. L.R.A.1918C.

<sup>229</sup> In Hickam v. Hollingsworth (Mo.) supra, it is stated that notice to present the note or demand against the estate of the decedent "will not expedite the collection if given within ten days after administration granted, more than if given ten months after. The law allows one year after administration granted, before there can be any compulsory order or process against the administrator to pay demands. . . . Now it is clear that the legislature never contemplated forcing the holder of such claim to commence his suit against the administrators in the county court or probate court, and also against the other parties liable, too, in these courts, or to sue the administrator in one court and the security in the bond or note in another court."

It is apparently the theory of National Bank v. Gilvin (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 152 S. W. 652, that a creditor is not bound to file his claim with an administrator although notified to do so by the surety, and it is held in this case that, even though he has filed his claim, "still this step did not in law impose upon him any duty of active diligence in obtaining payment of said claim, for the law imposes the duty of activity in such cases upon the surety rather than the creditor." There were other reasons, however, for denying relief to the surety in this case. See infra, note 231.

<sup>231</sup> National Bank v. Gilvin (Tex.) supra. The court concludes, however, that, even if the surety had statutory authority to require by notice the creditor to proceed be given by the executor<sup>232</sup> or the administrator.<sup>233</sup> And it may be given although the creditor has filed the notes for allowance in the probate court.<sup>234</sup>

A statute authorizing the giving of notice to the creditor, and requiring him thereupon to sue the principal debtor, is not available to a surety against whom, though alone, suit has already been begun by the creditor.<sup>234</sup>

The surety on the bond of an assignee for the benefit of creditors cannot, after suit has been brought against him to secure the amount of a judgment obtained against the assignee, on which an execution has been issued and returned nulla bona, give the notice required by a statute providing that a surety, co-obligor, or co-contractor, or one of several defendants to a judgment, may, by notice in writing to the creditor, require him to sue or issue execution within a stated time on penalty of releasing the person so giving the notice, as such statute does not apply to a case in which suit has been brought or in which execution has been issued against the principal.<sup>235</sup>

Nor is a surety against whom a judgment by default has already been obtained in an action on the note against both principal and surety, but in which process was returned not found as to the principal debtor, entitled to avail himself of such a statute.<sup>236</sup>

It has been held, however, under a statute against the estate of an insane principal under guardianship, a pleading alleging such notice is deficient unless it goes further and avers that the notice was not complied with. The decision is based in part, also, upon the insufficiency of the notice. See supra, note 229.

The notice in Cummins v. Garretson (1854) 15 Ark. 132, and Thompson v. Robinson (1879) 34 Ark. 44, was served after suit had been begun against the sureties, but no point was raised as to this; the notice was held insufficient to require suit.

give the creditor upon whom notice to sue has been served the right to bring the action himself or permit the surety to do so, that, where a note is signed by two debtors and a surety, and suit is begun, but service obtained on only one of the debtors and the surety, and thereafter the surety serves notice upon the holder of the note to bring suit against all the makers or permit him to do so in his own name and at his own expense, the failure of the holder to take any action in this regard until after the expiration of the time allowed by statute releases the surety, although the other debtor afterwards excepts service and judgment is taken against him at the trial.<sup>237</sup>

And it has been held that the filing of notes in the probate court does not prevent an administrator of the deceased surety from giving the notice under the statute.<sup>238</sup>

The equitable remedy is not available to a surety after judgment has been taken on the obligation.<sup>239</sup>

10. Rights of a surety not appearing as such on the instrument.

It is quite generally held that statutes such as those under consideration herein are available to a surety whose suretyship does not appear on the instrument, as against the payee.<sup>240</sup> It may be shown by parol against the payee of a note that a person who has signed an instrument is in fact a surety, as the payee is presumed to know the relation the parties sustain tor shall "bring his action upon such contract and prosecute the same to judgment." It is not stated against whom the action is to be brought.

<sup>238</sup> Hammond v. McHargue (1913) 170 Mo. App. 497, 156 S. W. 725. Apparently the notes were filed in the proceedings for settlement of the estate of the deceased surety, although this is not clear. The argument of the creditor was that she had a right to proceed against the signers of the note singly or jointly as she thought proper, and as she had already begun suit by filing the note for allowance in the probate court, she could not be required to proceed otherwise. In answer to this defense the court states: "We think the point not well taken. That right was not intended to permit her to destroy the right of a surety to give the statutory notice to sue."

to each other;<sup>241</sup> this is held to be no violation of the rule that a written instrument cannot be varied by parol evidence, since it does not affect the terms of the contract, but establishes a collateral fact merely.<sup>242</sup> And such a showing may be made at law upon a sealed instrument where the statute has put sealed instruments upon the footing of commercial paper.<sup>243</sup>

There is, however, some authority to the effect that these statutes are not available to a surety not appearing on the instrument as such. The judgment of a lower Federal court, to the effect that sureties who jointly and severally, with the principal, promise to pay, and thereby admit themselves as principals in a joint and several sealed note, cannot set up their suretyship so as to be relieved upon failure of the creditor to sue upon notice, was affirmed upon appeal to the United States Supreme Court by an equally divided court.<sup>244</sup> And it has been stated generally that, in order to sustain a plea by a surety that he was released by failure of the creditor to sue upon notice, "it must appear on the face of the note that he signed it as security."<sup>245</sup>

Where the suretyship does not appear on the face of the instrument,—the surety having signed the note apparently as maker though he might be only an accommodation maker, and in consequence only a surety,—and the note passes into the hands of a bona fide holder without notice of the suretyship, the surety cannot require such bona fide holder to sue.<sup>246</sup>

On the contrary, it has been held that notice may be given against a bona fide assignee of the note without notice of the suretyship.<sup>247</sup>

Where the suretyship does appear on the face of the instrument, the surety can require an assignee of the note to sue upon penalty of releasing the surety for failure.<sup>248</sup>

11. What contracts are within the operation of this rule.

A bond securing the payment of a stated sum of money by one who has been awarded the privilege of public weigher is a bond single for the payment of money, and not conditioned "to secure the performance of his trusts or the duty of his office," nor "for the performance of a covenant or agreement for the payment of money or delivery of property," within the meaning of a statute excluding such obligations from the operation of a statute relieving the surety in case the creditor fails to sue upon notice. Hence, the failure to sue after notice, by a surety on such bond relieves the surety.<sup>249</sup>

An indemnity bond given by a building contractor has been held to be within the meaning of a statute providing that any person bound as a surety upon any contract for the payment of money or the performance of any act, when the right of action has accrued, may require by notice in writing the creditor or obligee forthwith to institute suit upon such contract.<sup>250</sup>

But an indemnity bond given to a sure-

and several note of the debtor and his surety, apparently without any indication of suretyship on the face of the note. At any rate it is stated that the holder, to whom the notice was given, took the note in good faith without any knowledge of the suretyship, but that after he purchased the note and before its maturity he was informed by the surety that he was only surety on said note. The case was decided without any reference to the fact that the holder of the note, to whom the notice had been given, was an assignee, but on rehearing it was objected that the surety could not, after maturity of the note, avail himself of the remedy as to notice against a holder who was an assignee. Without directly discussing the relationship thus sustained by the holder, the court concludes that the surety was released by the holder's failure to sue as required in the notice.

ty company which signed an employee's fidelity bond, to protect it against loss on such fidelity bond, the indemnity bond not being signed by the employee nor by the indemnitors as sureties, is not within the operation of the statute giving any person bound as surety for another on any bond, bill, or note for the payment of money or the delivery of property the right to notify the creditor to commence suit against the principal debtor, and discharging such surety if the suit is not begun, since the statute is applicable only in cases where there is a principal debtor or obligor and a surety. A contract of indemnity is held distinguishable from a contract of guaranty or suretyship in that a contract of indemnity is an original and independent contract.<sup>251</sup>

A bond given by an agent for the faithful performance of his duties and the payments by him of all moneys received does not come within the statute.<sup>252</sup>

It has been said that such a statute does not refer to obligations given for public use.<sup>253</sup> Hence bonds given for school moneys to a county for the use of one of its school townships are held not to come within the provisions of a statute relating to sureties giving notice and being released by failure of the creditor to sue within the stated time. It is stated that no person has any special interest in the collection of such a bond, and one who becomes a surety must hold himself ready to pay it if the principal fails; that he will not be discharged on account of the neglect of public officers.<sup>254</sup> So a bond executed to a county for the use and benefit of a fund derived from the sale of swamp land in that county is not within the meaning of the statute.<sup>255</sup>

A bond given to a commissioner upon a judicial sale is not within the meaning of such a statute.<sup>256</sup> The statute is held to have no reference to statutory bonds, such as forthcoming bonds taken in the progress of judicial proceedings.<sup>257</sup>

A statute providing for notice by and release of a surety on bonds, bills, and notes for the direct payment of money or property does not apply to a contract for the sale and delivery of personal property; hence the surety on such a contract is not entitled thereunder to give the stipulated notice and to be released upon failure of creditor to sue.<sup>258</sup>

A statute providing for the release of sureties upon "contracts for the payment of money, or the performance of any other contract in writing," by the failure of the creditor to sue upon notice after a right of action has accrued on the contract, has been held not to refer to a contract of suretyship arising from a conveyance of mortgaged premises and the assumption of the mortgage debt by the grantee, so that the grantors thereby become sureties as between themselves for the debt, since the statute refers to contracts in writing binding sureties, and not to contracts of suretyship arising by implication.<sup>259</sup>

Where, upon the dissolution of a partnership, one partner is to collect the assets of the firm and pay its debts, and the other is to pay his share of any deficits, the latter cannot, by paying a creditor of the firm one half of the amount of a firm note, make himself a surety as to such creditor, so that a failure of the creditor thereafter to sue for the balance of the note releases such partner.<sup>260</sup> It is stated that, to entitle a party to proceed under the statutes relating to notice, he must have been a surety at the inception of the contract.

<sup>256</sup> Davis v. Sneed (1880) 33 Gratt. (Va.) 705. The theory of the court is that the commissioner is not a creditor within the meaning of this statute; another ground, not within the scope of the present note, is given for the decision in this case, so that it does not rest entirely upon the fact that the bond given to a commissioner is not within the terms of the statute.

The indorser of a note is not a security within the meaning of such a statute, and is not relieved by failure of the creditor to sue after notice.<sup>261</sup> By the express terms of some statutes, the rights of a surety under such a statute have been extended to indorsers.<sup>262</sup>

It has been held that a statute empowering a person bound as surety "in a written instrument for the payment of money," to give notice to the creditor to sue, requiring him to commence an action on such instrument forthwith against the principal debtor, is not available to a surety unless he appears upon the same instrument upon which the principal debtor is liable. Accordingly, one who has given a separate writing guaranteeing generally the payment of any note or notes which the obligee therein may discount for and on behalf of a certain named company was held not entitled to the benefits of the statute, where there was no express provision in either the note or the guaranty incorporating or enacting into it the other.<sup>263</sup>

12. Effect of discharge of one surety upon cosureties.

The courts are not agreed as to whether the discharge of one surety upon failure of the creditor to sue after notice by such surety, as required by statute, discharges another surety or sureties. One line of authorities holds that other sureties are not released. This is held under a statute providing that any person bound as security for another may, after action has accrued on the obligation, require the person having such right of action to begin suit, and if he fails to do so "such surety shall be exonerated from liability to the person notified;"<sup>264</sup> and under a statute providing that, in case the creditor fails to commence suit, "the surety shall be discharged;"<sup>265</sup> likewise under a statute empowering "any surety" to give the notice, and providing that in case of the failure of the creditor to bring suit as required "the surety who shall have given such notice shall be discharged from liability, and the creditor shall be barred from all recovery against him."<sup>266</sup> It has been contended that the discharge of one surety must work a discharge of the other because the claim for contribution which the latter, in case of payment of the debt by him, had against the former by virtue of the original obligation, is thereby destroyed; but this contention is denied in the face of the statute which was involved in this case.<sup>266</sup>

A surety having been released by the failure of the creditor to sue after notice is not liable for contribution to his cosurety who has paid the debt.<sup>267</sup>

Under a statute providing that, "when any person or persons shall hereafter become bound as security or securities, . . . it shall . . . be lawful . . . [under certain stated circumstances] to require . . . creditor or creditors to put the bond, bill, or note . . . in suit," and providing further that, upon failure of creditor to comply with the

That an indorser is not a surety within the meaning of the equitable rule, see supra, note 77.

In Martin v. Orr (1884) 96 Ind. 491, it is held that one surety is not released by the delay of the creditor in taking out execution, by a notice given by another surety to forthwith institute an action upon the note, since this notice cannot operate in favor of a surety other than the one giving the notice.

In Casson v. Rasback (1890) 36 Ill. App. 40, it is held that the release of one of the sureties who had attempted to give notice, from his obligation as surety, would not release other sureties.

request "of such security or securities," the creditor shall forfeit his rights against such "security or securities," a failure of the creditor in a joint obligation to sue upon request from three of four securities has been held to release the fourth. <sup>368</sup>

Another theory is that, in the case of joint suretyship, each surety is bound only for a ratable portion of the debt; that this liability cannot be increased, and that the release of one surety by the failure of the creditor to sue after notice from him does not release the remaining sureties, but leaves them still bound, but for the ratable portion of the debt only. <sup>369</sup>

13. Duty to attach debtor's property.

It has been held that the surety cannot impose upon the creditor the duty of attaching property of the debtor, even by offering to procure a bond for the attachment. <sup>370</sup> A surety who has requested the creditor to attach property of the debtor is not released by the failure of the creditor to do so, where the surety has not shown that there were legal grounds for suing out the attachment. <sup>371</sup>

14. Availability of the release as a defense at law.

As shown in II. b, 1, supra, the majority of courts hold the defense arising from failure to sue under the equitable rule a defense at law. It has been argued that the failure of a creditor to sue upon notice as required by statute is available to the surety as a defense only in equity; that it is not a defense in an action at law upon the instrument; this contention has been denied, as it clearly should have been. <sup>372</sup> Nor is this holding changed by a statutory provision that all persons signing an obligation are considered as principals, and no one of them can aver or show at law that he is security only, where the instrument sued on shows him to be a surety. <sup>373</sup> That the release is a defense at law has been held in case of sealed instruments when such instruments are by statute put upon the footing of commercial paper. <sup>374</sup>

15. Waiver.

Stipulations given at the time of executing the instrument, and contained in the obligation or elsewhere, have been urged as depriving the surety of his right to give notice under such a statute. It has been held that a surety who has given consent for a valuable consideration that the holder of the instrument on which he is surety may grant any extension thereon which he deems proper <sup>368</sup> Wright v. Stockton (1834) 5 Leigh (Va.) 153. It is here stated by the court that, if the statute were taken literally, it would seem to require that, where there are more sureties than one, all should join in the requisition, but that this construction would in a great measure defeat the remedy intended to be provided for by the statute, and would put it in the power of one, where there were many sureties, to prevent the notice by refusing to join. It is further stated that the common-law principle attaching to all joint obligations is that the discharge of one obligor is the discharge of all, and that the act of the creditor, in refusing to sue upon a request of three of the sureties, discharges those giving the notice, and their discharge, under the operation of the common-law principle, discharges all sureties. Again it is stated that the release of three of the sureties changes the situation of the fourth one in that he has no further right to call on his cosurety for contribution.

<sup>369</sup> Routon v. Lacy (1853) 17 Mo. 399. In this case there were two sureties; one of them having been released by the failure of the creditor to sue, the other was held liable to pay one half the demand.

There was held to be no security available to the creditor in Bumpus v. Lovejoy (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 196 S. W. 631; hence the objection of the surety that he was released by failure to levy on the security was held unavailing.

<sup>372</sup> State Bank v. Watkins (1845) 6 Ark. 123; Hempstead v. Watkins (1845) 6 Ark. 317, 42 Am. Dec. 696.

<sup>373</sup> State Bank v. Watkins (1845) 6 Ark. 123. This case does not contain any extended discussion of this point. The defense that the surety was relieved was demurred to on the ground that under the statute all persons signing an obligation are considered principals, and no one of them can aver or show at law that he is security only. The court states that the instrument itself purports to have been executed by defendant as security; that he is jointly and severally bound with his principal and cosecurity to the full extent for the payment of the note sued upon, unless discharged by some act or omission on the part of the payee to the prejudice of the security; that the bank, by failing to bring suit within thirty days after service of notice, discharged the surety from liability to it.

But a stipulation contained in a joint and several note, that "the makers and indorsers severally waive presentment for payment, protest, and notice of protest, and the bringing of suit at the first term of court upon nonpayment of this note after maturity, and also consent that time of payment may be extended without notice thereof," is a waiver of the defense provided by such a statute.<sup>276</sup>

The mere waiver in a note of grace,

protest, notice, and presentation for payment, however, has been held not to be a waiver of the right of the surety to give notice under the statute.<sup>277</sup>

And a provision in a note that "no extension of the time of payment with or without our knowledge, by the receipt of interest or otherwise, shall release us, or either of us, from the obligation of payment," has been stated not to be a perpetual waiver of a right given by the statute to the surety to demand an effort at collection by the payee for the protection of the surety.<sup>278</sup> written consent which he has given, directly, or by implication, as by giving the notice to sue immediately. At the time of extending credit to the principal debtor the holder of the instrument had the right to protect himself against such a defense, and he, by securing for a valuable consideration the consent of the surety to an extension, has secured to himself complete protection against the plea of the surety based upon the failure to sue after notice.

EAST ST. LOUIS & SUBURBAN RAIL-

(281 Ill. 385, 117 N. E. 1035.)

Infant — judgment — right of next friend to satisfy.

1. The next friend of an infant is not authorized to receive satisfaction of a judgment in favor of the infant where, by statute, none but a legally qualified guardian is authorized to receive and take charge of the property or estate of a minor.

For other cases, see Infants, III. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

For other cases, see Parent and Child, I. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Pleading — payment to infant — sufficiency.

4. A plea of payment to plaintiff of a judgment in favor of an infant is good, since its effect is that the payment was made to the guardian.

For other cases, see Pleading, III. d, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Interest — infant's judgment — want of guardian.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Fourth District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Madison County in plaintiff's favor in an action upon a judgment recovered by plaintiff against defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Williamson, Burroughs, & Ryder for appellant.

Messrs. Hiles & Simpson, for appellee:

An attorney of record representing the next friend of an infant plaintiff, or representing the infant himself, has no authority to receive the money in settlement of a judgment in favor of such infant and satisfy it of record.

Greenburg v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 210 N. Y. 505, 104 N. E. 931; Heiter v. Joline, 135 App. Div. 13, 119 N. Y. Supp. 819.

The next friend of an infant plaintiff has no authority to receive the money in settlement of a judgment in favor of said infant and satisfy it of record.

Greenburg v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. supra; Horowitz v. Independent Western Star Order, 183 Ill. App. 162; 22 Cyc. 704.

The father of an infant has no authority to receive the money in settlement of a judgment in favor of said infant and satisfy it of record.

Perry v. Carmichael, 95 Ill. 519.

A lawfully appointed and duly qualified guardian of an infant is the only person who can receive the money in settlement of a judgment in favor of said infant and satisfy it of record.

Greenburg v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co.; Perry v. Carmichael; and Horowitz v. Independent Western Star Order,—supra.

If an attempt is made to satisfy a judgment, but the attempt shows on its face that it is not regular, and is not done under lawful authority, the attempted satisfaction need not be set aside before suit can be brought on said judgment.

Seymour v. Haines, 104 Ill. 557.

The fact that an infant has no guardian at the time judgment is rendered in his favor is no excuse for the payment by the party liable on said judgment to a party not entitled under the law to receive it.

Perry v. Carmichael, 95 Ill. 519; Horowitz v. Independent Western Star Order, 183 Ill. App. 162.

A plea of payment in an action upon a record, which does not allege satisfaction of the record, is bad on demurrer.

Cooke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the East St. Louis & Suburban Railway Company from a judgment of the appellate court for the fourth district, affirming a judgment of the circuit court of Madison county in an action of L.R.A.1918C.

debt brought by Frank Paskewie, a minor, by H. C. Gerke, his guardian, and comes to this court upon a certificate of importance.

The declaration consists of one count, and alleges that Frank Paskewie, by John Paskewie, his next friend, on August 10, 1914, recovered a judgment against appellant for $444 and costs in the St. Clair county circuit court; that the same remains in full force; and that appellant has not paid to appellee the amount of said judgment or any part thereof, but refuses to do so. Appellant filed three pleas, to which demurrers were sustained, and then, upon leave granted, filed an additional plea, to which a demurrer was also sustained. The appellant elected to stand by its pleas, and judgment was rendered for $478.96, $34.96 of which was the amount of accrued interest from August 10, 1914, the date of rendition of judgment in the circuit court of St. Clair county.

By its first plea the appellant stated that it "did, on the 10th day of August, 1914, pay to the plaintiff the said sum of $444 damages recovered by said plaintiff against the defendant in the St. Clair county circuit court, as in said declaration alleged." By its second plea it alleged that after the recovery of the judgment declared upon, it paid the attorney of record of the plaintiff in the suit in which the judgment was recovered the said sum of $444, together with costs. By the third plea it was alleged that payment had been made to the attorney for plaintiff in the suit in the circuit court of St. Clair county, who was then an attorney at law and the attorney of record for the plaintiff, and that said attorney thereupon discharged and satisfied the said judgment of record. The additional plea alleged that appellant, after the recovery of the judgment sued on, caused the sum of $444 to be paid to the father of plaintiff as full payment and discharge of that judgment; that the plaintiff was then, and yet is, a minor, and that the father was next friend of plaintiff in the suit in which the judgment declared on was recovered, and accepted said sum in payment and discharge of that judgment; that plaintiff then was, and since is, a minor, living with his father as a member of his family; that the sum so paid to the father was expended for physicians' bills, care, maintenance, education, and other necessities for the sole use and benefit of plaintiff, prior to the bringing of this suit; and that at the time of such payment to the father the plaintiff had no guardian.

The principal question raised by these pleadings is whether a judgment secured by a minor may be satisfied by payment of the amount recovered to the next friend or his attorney. In this state there is no statute which expressly or by implication authorizes such a payment. Under our statutes the only person authorized to receive and take charge of the property or estate of a minor is the legally qualified guardian, and it is the general rule that no one but the legal guardian of an infant has authority to receive payment and enter satisfaction of a judgment recovered in favor of such infant. The duty of the next friend begins and ends with the prosecution of the infant's suit, unless by statute he is authorized to take further action after the termination of the suit. The precise question here raised has never before arisen in this state, and there is not a great volume of authority in other jurisdictions. The weight of authority in jurisdictions where no statutory provision on the subject exists is to the effect that the next friend does not have the right to receive payment of and to satisfy a judgment recovered in behalf of the infant. See Smith v. Redus, 9 Ala. 99, 44 Am. Dec. 429; Glass v. Glass, 76 Ala. 368; Barbee v. Williams, 4 Heisk. 522; Miles v. Kaigler, 10 Yerg. 10, 30 Am. Dec. 425; Benton v. Pope, 5 Humph. 392; Cody v. Roane Iron Co. 105 Tenn. 515, 58 S. W. 860; Fletcher v. Parker, 53 W. Va. 422, 97 Am. St. Rep. 991, 44 S. E. 422; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Styron, 66 Tex. 421, 1 S. W. 161; Galveston City R. Co. v. Hewitt, 67 Tex. 473, 60 Am. Rep. 32, 3 S. W. 705; Greenburg v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 210 N. Y. 505, 104 N. E. 931; Allen v. Roundtree, 1 Speers, L. 80; 22 Cyc. 407. These cases are grounded upon sounder reasoning than the few holding to the contrary. While the next friend acts by the appointment of court, express or implied, and is subject to the orders and direction of the court, and may be removed, he acts only for the purposes of the suit. In the absence of any statutory provision he is not required to give a bond to the infant, and is not authorized to receive any of the infant's property. To hold that a demand due an infant could be discharged by payment to one who was not legally authorized to receive it, and who could be forced to pay the money over only in case he was solvent, would not only result in depriving an infant of that protection which the law has ever thrown around him, but would be in direct conflict with our Guardian and Ward Act.

As the next friend has no authority to receive payment and enter satisfaction of the judgment, it necessarily follows that the attorney, who derives his authority solely from the next friend, is not clothed with such authority. Collins v. Gillespy, 148 Ala. 558, 121 Am. St. Rep. 81, 41 So. 930. L.R.A.1918C.

So far as the allegation in the third plea, that appellant paid the amount of the judgment to the father of plaintiff, is concerned, that allegation does not present a defense, because the father has no right, by reason of the parental relation, to the custody of the estate of his minor child. Perry v. Carmichael, 95 Ill. 519.

The court properly sustained the demurrers to the second and third pleas, and to the additional plea.

It is insisted that, in any event, the first plea is a good plea of payment. That plea in general terms alleges the payment of the amount of the judgment to the plaintiff. It will be noted that the action in the case under consideration was brought by Frank Paskewie, a minor, by H. C. Gerke, his guardian. Our statute on guardian and ward provides that the guardian shall demand and sue for, and receive in his own name as guardian, all the personal property of and demands due his ward. Regarding the guardian as the only proper person plaintiff in this action, the plea squarely alleges payment of the amount of the judgment secured in the circuit court of St. Clair county to the guardian. Treating the minor as the plaintiff here, as is done by counsel, the plea is still a good plea of payment, because under the statute the only legal payment that could be made to the minor would be one made to his legally qualified guardian, and the effect of the allegation of this plea is that the payment was so made. Under this plea appellant would have a right to prove, if it could do so, that it had paid the amount of this judgment to the legal guardian of the minor. The plea was sufficient, and the court erred in sustaining the demurrer thereto.

Appellant contends that the damages assessed were excessive, as it appears from the record that the judgment was secured on August 10, 1914, and no guardian was appointed for the minor until September 14, 1914, and as there was no one authorized to receive the amount of the judgment during that period, it should not bear interest until after the appointment of the guardian. A judgment in this state bears interest from the date it is rendered, and there is no reason for any exception in this case. Appellant had the right, if it desired to pay the judgment and prevent the accruing of interest, to apply to the probate court for the appointment of a guardian for the minor.

The judgments of the Appellate and Circuit Courts are reversed, and the cause is remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the first plea.

Annotation—Right of next friend to receive payment of, and satisfy, judgment recovered in behalf of infant.

The present annotation supplements that to Wood v. Claiborne, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 913.

As to right of parent, guardian, or next friend to compromise infant's cause of action for personal injuries, see note to Missouri P. R. Co. v. Lasca, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 338, which is supplemented by the annotation to Leslie v. Procter & G. Mfg. Co. post, 58. As to right of attorney employed by guardian ad litem or next friend of an infant to receive payment and satisfy a judgment recovered in behalf of the infant, see note to State ex rel. Lane v. Ballinger, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 72.

As is stated in the earlier note, the weight of authority in jurisdictions not controlled by statutory provision on the subject is against the right of a next friend to receive payment of, and satisfy, a judgment recovered in behalf of an infant. For late cases supporting this doctrine, see Aley v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1908) 211 Mo. 460, 111 S. W. 102; Greenburg v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1914) 210 N. Y. 505, 104 N. E. 931; and Fidelity Trust Co. v. Buchner (1912) 26 Ont. L. Rep. 367, 22 Ont. Week. Rep. 72, 5 D. L. R. 282. This is upon the theory that the duty of a next friend begins and ends with the prosecution of the infant's suit. Greenburg v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) supra. And see Fidelity Trust Co. v. Buchner (Ont.) supra, holding that the next friend is brought into court simply to protect the infant's rights and guarantee costs.

And for a better reason a next friend is not entitled to receive payment of and satisfy a judgment recovered in behalf of an infant where by statute none but a legally qualified guardian is authorized to receive and take charge of the property and estate of a minor. PASKEWIE v. EAST ST. LOUIS & SUBURBAN R. Co. ante, 52. And again, in Horowitz v. Independent Western Star Order (1913) 183 Ill. App. 162, it was held, without reference to any statute, that while the prosecution of a suit for an infant may be undertaken and conducted by a next friend, he is not authorized to collect the judgment, the court saying that payment should be into the court, or to a lawfully appointed guardian.

And in Texas a judgment should not authorize the payment thereof to the next friend of an infant plaintiff without requiring him to give bond, as required by the Texas statutes. Parriss v. Jewell (1909) 57 Tex. Civ. App. 199, 122 S. W. 399. G. J. C.

Infant — settlement of claim by father — effect.

1. Where a minor has sustained personal injuries which his father and the wrongdoer settled for an inadequate sum, such minor, on attaining his majority, may bring an action against the wrongdoer for his injuries notwithstanding the settlement negotiated by his father.

For other cases, see Infants, III. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Headnotes by Dawson, J.

Note. — The right of a parent, guardian, or next friend to compromise an infant's cause of action for personal injuries is discussed in the annotation following this case, post, 58. L.R.A.1918C.

Compromise — by father — child's claim.

2. An inadequate settlement by a father for his minor son's injuries does not bar an action by the son on attaining his majority, although the father and the wrongdoer had by agreement filed an action in a city court (like that of a justice of the peace) for the agreed sum, and judgment had been taken thereon against the wrongdoer without evidence, without judicial consideration, and with only a perfunctory entry of the judgment by the city court for the agreed sum. For other cases, see Infants, III. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Equity — setting aside compromise.

3. In the circumstances narrated in paragraphs 1 and 2 of the syllabus, it was unnecessary for the son to give any countenance to the judgment in the city court, or to appeal from that judgment; he could properly proceed by an independent action in a court having general jurisdiction both at law and in equity, and have the judgment of the city court set aside as a pertinent incident to the securing of adequate redress for his injuries.

For other cases, see Judgment, VII. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Judgment — suit to set aside.

4. On attaining his majority, the plaintiff brought an action in the district court, in which his petition, in substance, alleged that when he was seventeen years old he sustained an injury to his hand while in defendant's employment and through the latter's negligence; that his father, without authority, settled plaintiff's claim for damages for $300, a grossly inadequate sum; that an attorney employed by defendant filed an action against the defendant in a city court for the agreed amount; that another attorney employed by defendant confessed judgment for the agreed amount; that there was no trial, no evidence, no judicial consideration of the facts nor of the propriety or adequacy of the settlement. All the pertinent facts were pleaded. Held, that a demurrer to such a petition was properly overruled.

For other cases, see Pleading, VII. c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Appeal — continuation pending.

5. When a litigant has determined to bring an immediate appealable order of the district court to the supreme court for review, he commits no impropriety and loses no rights by suggesting to the district court the advisability of continuing the cause in the trial court until the supreme court determines the question presented by the appeal.

Newland v. Gentry, 18 B. Mon. 666; Rals-ton v. Lahee, 8 Iowa, 17, 74 Am. Dec. 291.

Dawson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff brought this action for damages sustained while in defendant's employment by an injury to his hand. The petition alleged that in 1912, when plaintiff was a minor about seventeen years old, he was employed in defendant's packing house; that while so employed he slipped and fell on a wet and oily floor, and his hand was caught and crushed in a box nailing machine; that the machine was defective, and had no fender or guard about it; and that it was practical to have such a guard. It was also alleged that in 1913 the defendant made an agreement with plaintiff's father whereby defendant was to pay plaintiff and his father the sum of $300 in settlement of plaintiff's claim for the injuries sustained by him, and that a judgment for that agreed sum should be rendered for plaintiff and against the defendant in a city court (like that of a justice of the peace) in Kansas City, Kansas; that, pursuant thereto, the defendant's attorney caused a petition to be drawn, entitled "Alfred Leslie, a minor under the age of twenty-one, by and through his father as guardian and next friend, Willey Leslie, plaintiff, versus The Procter & Gamble Manufacturing Company, a corporation, defendant," wherein it was alleged that the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendant the sum of $300 for the injuries to the plaintiff. The defendant employed another attorney to sign the said petition as attorney for the plaintiff, but the said attorney was not in fact attorney for the plaintiff, but was one of the attorneys for the defendant. The petition continues:

"That the defendant, by its attorneys, . . . caused the petition to be filed in the city court, . . . and caused a judgment to be entered . . . in favor of the plaintiff Alfred Leslie and against [itself] . . . for three hundred dollars ($300). . . ."

"The aforesaid judgment was entered solely by agreement and consent of the defendant and Willey Leslie. No trial was had before the court, and no evidence was offered or presented to the court. No hearing or inquiry was made by the court into the merits of the case or of the rights of the plaintiff, and no judicial examination of the facts was made by the court to determine whether the settlement was reasonable and proper. . . . At the time of said proceeding, Willey Leslie was not the legal guardian of Alfred Leslie, nor was he appointed by the said city court as next friend of Alfred Leslie, nor did he qualify as next friend of Alfred Leslie in the said action in the city court.

"The plaintiff has been and is greatly aggrieved and hindered by the said settlement and judgment in the city court. Said settlement was not fair to the plaintiff, and plaintiff was thereby deprived of his substantial rights, and has been and will be defrauded out of a large sum of money, to wit, three thousand dollars ($3,000), which he should recover from the defendant, unless said settlement and judgment is set aside. The said proceeding and judgment were illegal, null, and void, and should be vacated and held for naught. As against said judgment the plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law. . . ."

"The plaintiff, Alfred Leslie, became twenty-one years of age August 21, 1916, and he disaffirmed the aforesaid settlement for three hundred dollars ($300) within a reasonable time after he became of age, by bringing this suit on the 12th day of September, 1916.

"The plaintiff has not had any power or control of any part of the three hundred dollars ($300) paid on said pretended settlement, since the plaintiff arrived at the age of majority."

Defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's petition was overruled, and the correctness of this ruling is the subject of this review.

The appellee raises a preliminary question, that defendant cannot have this ruling determined at this time because its counsel filed a motion in the district court, alleging that it had appealed to the supreme court on the ruling on the demurrer, and that "this defendant therefore respectfully requests this court to make an order staying further proceedings in this court until said appeal shall have been disposed of by the supreme court."

The rule announced in Union P. R. Co. v. Estes, 37 Kan. 229, 15 Pac. 157, does not cover the incident at bar. The defendant, having appealed, could ask for nothing from the district court as a matter of right, but there was no impropriety in suggesting a stay, a continuance, until the supreme court had determined the question appealed. The practice of asking a continuance or suggesting to the trial court its propriety when an intermediate appeal is taken is common, although it is not ordinarily made with the formality of a written motion.

Passing, then, to the main question, it is defendant's contention that the district court had no jurisdiction to entertain this cause as an independent action, and that it could only exercise an appellate jurisdiction to affirm, reverse, modify, or vacate the judgment of the city court. Defendant also insists on the application of the ordinary rule that a judgment can only be vacated in the court in which it is rendered.

In this case, however, it should be noted that the petition contains allegations of extrinsic fraud not involved in the issues in the city court case, and the judgment is therefore properly subjected to a direct attack. Moreover, the judgment in the city court was not upon the merits, but upon an unauthorized agreement between plaintiff's father and the defendant. There was no judicial consideration of the matter at all in the city court, not even on the question whether the infant's interests were being protected by the agreement to which the city court was asked to give its judicial sanction. There was in fact no judgment in any proper sense, but merely a mummery of form in a vain endeavor to give some colorable judicial approval of the settlement.

In McAdow v. Boten, 67 Kan. 136, 72 Pac. 529, it was held that an independent suit could be maintained to set aside a sale of property and to set aside an administrator's deed thereto which had been procured through extrinsic fraud.

In Fincke v. Bundrick, 72 Kan. 182, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 820, 83 Pac. 403, where a sale of real estate had been made by an executor pursuant to an order of the probate court, fraudulently procured, a minor, whose interests had been sacrificed in such sale, was permitted, on attaining her majority, to maintain an action to set aside the sale and to set aside the executor's deed. The court said: "Since it was not possible for the plaintiff to obtain relief in the probate court, administration having been closed and the executor finally discharged, the district court had jurisdiction to entertain her suit. Gafford v. Dickinson, 37 Kan. 287, 15 Pac. 175; McAdow v. Boten, 67 Kan. 136, 72 Pac. 529." 72 Kan. 189, 83 Pac. 406.

It is not discernible how the wrongs of plaintiff, alleged in his petition, could have been redressed in the city court nor by an appeal from that judgment. The city court judgment, treating it as a bona fide judgment, was for the full amount prayed for in the petition prepared by an attorney furnished by defendant, and filed by him under the unauthorized agreement made with plaintiff's father.

In Union P. R. Co. v. Luck, 79 Kan. 320, 100 Pac. 278, an independent action in an infant's behalf was entertained to set aside a judgment theretofore rendered in favor of the infant for an inadequate sum for personal injuries. That action was brought in the same court—a court of record—in which the prior judgment had been rendered. This court said that "as a general rule a judgment can only be vacated in the court in which it was rendered." (p. 320.) But as we have seen in McAdow v. Boten and Fincke v. Bundrick, supra, the jurisdiction of the district court may be invoked to set aside judgments of an inferior court for fraud extrinsic to the issues without the formality of seeking their correction in the inferior court which rendered such judgment. And if this may be done with reference to such judgments in the probate court, it may certainly be done with reference to such judgments of a city court whose status is but that of a justice of the peace. In 1 Black on Judgments, § 297, it is said: "The power to vacate judgments is said to be incident to all courts of record, and to be usually exercised under restraints imposed by their own rules. It is not commonly possessed by the inferior tribunals, —courts not of record,—such as the courts of magistrates or justices of the peace, though in some of the states it may be."

Where the fraud complained of is extrinsic to the issues, an independent action is permitted, and ordinarily equitable relief is a necessary and pertinent feature of such an action, and it is not necessary to bring it in the inferior court where the first judgment was rendered, especially if such court has no equitable jurisdiction. Moreover, a mere vacation of the collusive judgment in the city court was not all the relief the plaintiff was entitled to. Tested by defendant's demurrer, he is entitled to relief for a sum ten times greater than the city court could give.

It is urged that the plaintiff's petition is but a collateral attack on the judgment entered in the city court. We think not. It is a direct attack. "Proceedings instituted for the purpose of destroying, impairing, or modifying the force or effect of a judgment for all cases, such as proceedings to reverse, vacate, set aside, declare void, suspend, modify, or perpetually enjoin a judgment, are direct proceedings." Mastin v. Gray, 19 Kan. 458, 466, 27 Am. Rep. 149.

As against a demurrer the petition sufficiently alleged the plaintiff's grievances, the misconduct of defendant and of plaintiff's father; it shows that there was in fact no trial, no judicial consideration, no bona fide judgment, but merely a complainant and perfunctory acquiescence by the city court in the unauthorized settlement; it shows the predicament of plaintiff on account of the collusive proceedings, and that only the strong arm of a court of equity can sweep the rubbish of the settlement out of his way so that his wrongs may be adequately redressed.

In all the discussion of the facts of this case, it should not be overlooked that the court only assumes the facts pleaded in the petition to be true for the purpose of testing the propriety of the demurrer. The proof may wholly fail. When defendant answers and the evidence is adduced, a radically different state of affairs may be disclosed.

But the facts as pleaded do disclose that plaintiff has no other adequate remedy, and the demurrer to his petition was properly overruled.

Annotation—Right of parent, guardian, or next friend to compromise infant's cause of action for personal injuries.

The present annotation supplements that to Missouri P. R. Co. v. Lasca, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 338.

And as to right of next friend to receive payment of and satisfy judgment recovered in behalf of infant, see note L.R.A.1918C.

to Wood v. Claiborne, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 913, and the supplemental annotation following Paskewie v. East St. Louis & S. R. Co. ante, 55.

The doctrine of the earlier cases, that a parent, guardian, or next friend cannot compromise or settle an infant's cause of action for personal injuries, is supported by Butler v. Winchester Home (1914) 216 Mass. 567, 104 N. E. 451, citing Tripp v. Gifford (1891) 155 Mass. 109, 31 Am. St. Rep. 530, 29 N. E. 208, which is set out and quoted at some length in the earlier note. So, in Joyce v. Washington Storage Warehouse & Van Co. (1917) 176 App. Div. 538, 163 N. Y. Supp. 519, it was held that neither a compromise of an infant's cause of action for personal injuries, signed by a guardian ad litem and the infant, nor a payment of the agreed sum to such guardian, affected the infant's rights against the wrongdoer where no order had been obtained allowing a compromise and no bond had been given by the guardian ad litem, as required by a statute providing that an infant's guardian ad litem shall not receive money of or for the infant until he has given sufficient security, approved by the court.

And where a parent and the wrongdoer have settled an infant's cause of action for an inadequate sum, it has been held that the minor, on attaining his majority, may maintain an action against the wrongdoer notwithstanding the settlement negotiated by the parent. LESLIE v. PROCTER & G. MFG. Co. ante, 55. And this notwithstanding the taking of a judgment in an inferior court against the wrongdoer pursuant to an agreement with the father, where the same was taken without evidence, without judicial consideration, and with only a perfunctory entry of a judgment for the agreed sum, it being in such a case unnecessary to either recognize the judgment or appeal therefrom, and the proper procedure being to bring an independent action and have the judgment set aside as a pertinent incident of the securing of redress for the wrong. Ibid.

But, applying the rule that judgments and orders cannot be collaterally attacked for fraud not affecting the jurisdiction, it has been held that a judgment of dismissal in an action by the next friend of an infant to recover damages for personal injuries, entered after the action had been compromised and the claim released by the next friend, cannot be collaterally attacked. Thus, in Clark v. Southern Can Co. (1911) 116 Md. 85, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 980, 81 Atl. 271, where an infant brought an action by her next friend for personal injuries, which claim was compromised and the case marked "agreed and settled," and which compromise and settlement were made under the eye and sanction of the L.R.A. 1918C.

court and pursuant to a statute expressly authorizing the next friend who has brought a suit at law for the benefit of an infant to compromise and settle the same, it was held that such next friend could not institute another suit in the same court to recover against the same person for the same injuries while the record of the prior suit remained, although it was claimed that the compromise, release, and consequent entry were procured by fraud, the court saying: "We think from both principle and authorities that the release in the prior case and the orders based thereon upon which the entry of 'agreed and settled' was made under the eye and with the sanction of the court in that case cannot, from the facts and circumstances here disclosed, be annulled and set aside by the collateral proceeding thereafter instituted by the appellant against the appellee, and from the judgment in which case this appeal is taken. The appellant is asking in a collateral proceeding instituted in a court of law that a judgment previously entered in a prior case by the same court, in a suit brought to recover for the same injuries for the recovery of which this suit is instituted, be set aside and annulled. The plaintiff's remedy in this case was either by motion to strike out the judgment, filed in due season in the court in which the judgment was entered, or by a direct proceeding instituted in a court of equity within a reasonable time after the discovery of the facts which are supposed to establish the fraud for the setting aside and annulment of the judgment."

Messrs. Frank P. Fralli and Charles Grillo, for defendant:

Eviction consists in some act of the landlord upon the premises which involves the physical exclusion of the tenant from the same or from a material part thereof.

The offer of proof did not show that the lessor or her representative had so interfered with the lessee's estate as to exclude him from or permanently deprive him of, its full use and enjoyment as it existed at the date of the demise.

Smith v. McEnany, 170 Mass. 26, 64 Am. St. Rep. 272, 48 N. E. 781.

To constitute an eviction there must be some act done on the premises with the intent of depriving the tenant of the enjoyment and occupation of the whole or part of the demised premises.

Bartlett v. Farrington, 120 Mass. 284.

The act of the defendant had no tendency to interrupt, and did not interrupt, the lessee's quiet enjoyment.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought by the lessee against his lessor. The declaration is in two counts. By the lease dated September 28, 1912, the premises were demised to the plaintiff for two years from October 1, 1912. The plaintiff offered to show that the premises consisted of a store and four-family suites, that the plaintiff paid the rent to February 1, 1913, and on the same day the agent of defendant received from one of the plaintiff's tenants the rent for one month, due on that day, and receipted for the same in the defendant's name, and that the defendant had written this tenant forbidding him to pay rent to the plaintiff, and gave like notice to the other tenants, all of whom refused to pay rent to the plaintiff, "who has never received any rent from any of said tenants, since that which accrued on February 1, 1913, though plaintiff paid to defendant on March 1, 1913, the rent which became due under the lease on that day;" that the defendant represented to all the tenants that the plaintiff had no right to the premises and had "procured them to attorn to her as their landlord," and the plaintiff, learning of this, wrote the defendant and "at the end of March, 1913, removed from the suite which he occupied and surrendered the lease to defendant."

The first count of the declaration alleges that the plaintiff was evicted from the leasehold. The plaintiff's offer did not show the disturbance of his possession or that he was deprived of the beneficial enjoyment of the leasehold. The collection of the rent from the plaintiff's tenants and the notice forbidding them to pay any further rent to him were acts which did not constructively evict him from his estate. "To constitute an eviction . . . there must either be an actual expulsion of the tenant, or some act of a permanent character, done by the landlord with the intention and effect of depriving the tenant of the enjoyment of the demised premises or some part of it, to which he yields, abandoning the possession within a reasonable time." Bartlett v. Farrington, 120 Mass. 284; Taylor v. Finnigan, 189 Mass. 568, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 973, 76 N. E. 203; Skally v. Shute, 132 Mass. 367; Royce v. Guggenheim, 106 Mass. 201, 8 Am. Rep. 322.

The acts complained of did not amount to an eviction, as the offer of proof did not show that by his wrongful act the landlord had deprived the tenant of the beneficial use and enjoyment of the whole or a part of the leasehold. Taylor v. Finnigan, 189 Mass. 568, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 973, 76 N. E. 203. The plaintiff cannot recover under the first count.

The acts stated in the offer of proof, even if they constituted an interference with the rights of the plaintiff, were not equivalent to a breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment. The defendant did not enter upon the land and repossess himself of his former estate, determining the estate of his lessee. And the tenants were estopped to deny their landlord's title. They remained his tenants, for the reason that they were not ousted by one having a superior title, or compelled to yield to the lawful owner of a claim which could not be resisted, without entry on the premises by such owner. See, in this connection, Hinckley v. Guyon, 172 Mass. 412, 52 N. E. 523; George v. Putney, 4 Cush. 351, 50 Am. Dec. 788; Eddy v. Coffin, 149 Mass. 463, 14 Am. St. Rep. 441, 21 N. E. 870; Morse v. Goddard, 13 Met. 177, 46 Am. Dec. 728; King v. Bird, 148 Mass. 572, 20 N. E. 196; Casassa v. Smith, 206 Mass. 69, 91 N. E. 891; Groustra v. Bourges, 141 Mass. 7, 4 N. E. 623. The offer of proof does not bring the case within Holbrook v. Young, 108 Mass. 83, where the defendants' lessors were themselves tenants at will of two stores, one of which they leased in writing to the defendants. After the execution of the lease the tenants at will became bankrupt. The reversioner thereupon entered and required the tenants to attorn to her, which they did, and it was there decided that these proceedings terminated the tenancy of the tenants at will and constituted an eviction of the lessees, so that when they were sued for rent by the assignee of the bankrupts, the defendants could recoup for the breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment.

Rejecting the immaterial matter alleged in the second count, the plaintiff, after stating in effect that the defendant wrongfully interfered with his tenants and prevented them from paying rent to the plaintiff, asserts that by such means the defendant thereby ousted the plaintiff, whereby he was evicted. For the reasons stated, there was no eviction or ouster, and on the offer of proof there can be no recovery on the second count. Some of the allegations of this count would indicate that the plaintiff was seeking to recover on the ground of an intentional and unjust interference with an existing contract. See McGurk v. Cronenwett, 199 Mass. 457, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 561, 85 N. E. 576; Wheeler-Stenzel Co. v. American Window Glass Co. 202 Mass. 471, L.R.A.1915F, 1076, 89 N. E. 28; Beakman v. Marsters, 195 Mass. 205, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 201, 122 Am. St. Rep. 232, 80 N. E. 817, 11 Ann. Cas. 332.

We do not decide that the averments of this count, standing alone, were sufficient, together with the offer of proof, to entitle the plaintiff to recover under the principle of the above cases. These averments of unlawful interference were matters of inducement, introductory to the statement of the eviction or ouster of the plaintiff, which was the principal subject of the count and the one upon which he relied, and which is merely explained by the introductory matter describing the unlawful interference with the plaintiff's contract rights.

Exceptions overruled.

Annotation—Eviction by interference with sublessee.

The holding in AGUGLIA v. CAVICCHIA, ante, 59, that there is no evidence of the lessee where the lessor notifies the undertenants to pay no rent to the lessee, actually collects rent from some of the undertenants, and the lessee vacates because of such acts, is against the great weight of authority, both English and American. In fact, all other authority supports the proposition that, under such circumstances, there is an eviction. L.R.A.1918C.

In Burn v. Phelps (1815) 1 Starkie (Eng.) 94, 18 Revised Rep. 749, the landlord gave notice to the undertenants of tenant to quit, and one of them vacated accordingly, the premises occupied by him remaining unoccupied for a year; the tenant paid all the rent except for the time this particular property remained unoccupied, and the landlord brought action for rent. Lord Ellenborough was of the opinion that the landlord was guilty of an eviction, at least as to the particular premises, and suggested that an eviction might have been pleaded to the whole demand.

Edge v. Boileau (1885) L. R. 16 Q. B. Div. (Eng.) 117, is on all fours as to its facts with AGUGLIA v. CAVICCHIA, ante, 59, but the court reached the opposite conclusion. The court said: "In my judgment there is sufficient evidence to show that there has been a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment. The covenant is in the usual terms. The facts are these: During the plaintiff's term, there being some rent in arrear, the agent for the defendants, the plaintiff's lessors, by their authority, sends to the tenants of the plaintiff a notice desiring them not to pay their rents to the plaintiff, but to pay them to the defendants, and threatening them with legal proceedings in default of compliance with the notice. It is obvious what the probable results of such a notice would be. It is impossible, as it seems to me, to hold that, under the circumstances of this case, and having regard to what actually followed, this notice can be treated as no more than a mere false and idle claim or threat of which no notice might be taken. To my mind there is evidence of a substantial disturbance of the plaintiff's quiet enjoyment of the property demised. The case of Witchcot v. Nine (1611) 1 Brownl. & G. 81, 123 Eng. Reprint, 679, is the only authority to which we were referred on this subject. When the report of that case is looked at, it is very short, and simply comes to this; that the mere telling a tenant not to pay his rent is not necessarily a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment. There is nothing said as to the circumstances under which the man was told not to pay his rent, and it appears that he did pay his rent notwithstanding the notice. I can understand that there might be circumstances under which such a notice might be treated as a mere idle threat and as not amounting to a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment because there was no substantial interference with the enjoyment. Here I think that there is a substantial interference with the rights of the plaintiff, and one which might very well seriously affect the value of his property."

In Levitzky v. Canning (1867) 33 Cal. 299, it was held that there was a breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment where lessor had constructively evicted lessee's subtenants, and the court said: "From the third count in the complaint it appears that the defendant had slandered the plaintiff's possession, giving out and pretending publicly that he had no right to the possession of the demised premises, and that he had brought two actions at law to recover the possession of the premises from the plaintiff and his tenants, under the pretense that his lease had expired. That in consequence of these actions brought against himself and his tenants he had been put to great expense in defending the same, and his tenants had quit the premises, leaving the same vacant, and that he had been unable to rent the same to other parties, by reason of their doubts as to the lawfulness of his possession, caused by the acts of the defendant in bringing said suits and publicly declaring that the possession of the plaintiff was unlawful and that he had no legal right to let the premises. Was this a breach of his covenant within the rule already stated and the cases which we have cited? That it was does not admit of doubt. Those acts, if performed by him, were as much a molestation, disturbance, and invasion of the plaintiff's possession as a taking by the shoulders and a forcible eviction of the plaintiff's tenants would have been. The character of the act must be determined by the results which follow it, and in view of the results which are alleged to have followed the acts of the defendant, there can be no question that he disturbed and interrupted the possession of the plaintiff to his injury, which is precisely what he had covenanted not to do."

And the court in Agar v. Winslow (1899) 123 Cal. 587, 69 Am. St. Rep. 84, 56 Pac. 422, recognized the same principle with approval, distinguishing the instant case from the Levitzky Case by the fact that the landlord had not disturbed the subtenants, but had actually advised them to pay their rent to lessee.

In Leadbeater v. Roth (1861) 25 Ill. 587, it was held that the landlord is guilty of an eviction of his tenant so as to bar his right to further payment of rent where he forbids the undertenant to pay rent to the tenant, and demands payment thereof to himself. This view was also adopted in Burhans v. Monier (1889) 38 App. Div. 466, 56 N. Y. Supp. 632.

It was held in Rowbotham v. Pearce (1876) 5 Houst. (Del.) 135, that a lessor's wilfully preventing the lessee from subletting the premises, so that they remained unoccupied, was an eviction which would sustain an action for breach of covenant of quiet enjoyment. And the same principle underlies the decision in Doran v. Chase (1876) 2 W. N. C. (Pa.) 609, cited with approval in Hoeveler v. Fleming (1879) 91 Pa. 322. And the same rule is recognized in Tennes v. American Bldg. Co. (1913) 72 Wash. 644, 131 Pac. 201, but not applied, for the reason that the lessee retained possession and did not treat the act as an eviction.

Where the landlord refused to permit tenant's undertenant to take possession of the premises, there was an eviction that will bar an action for rent against the tenant. Randall v. Alburdis (1857) 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 285.

In Ogilvie v. Hull (1843) 5 Hilt (N. Y.) 52, the court distinguished the case before it from Burn v. Phelps (1815) 1 Starkie (Eng.) 94, 18 Revised Rep. 749, by the fact that the tenant remained in possession and failed to show that the acts of the landlord were the real cause of his failure to sublet.

ABRAHAM L. REED

v.

AMERICAN BONDING COMPANY OF BALTIMORE, Appt.

(— Neb. —, 166 N. W. 196.)

Insurance — larceny — proof.

1. Under the contract sued upon, "the mere disappearance of an article" is not sufficient evidence of larceny; but, when other circumstances are in evidence indicating larceny, it may become a question for the jury.

For other cases, see Trial, II. c. 9, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Costs — attorney's fee.

2. Our former decisions, that an attorney's fee may be allowed as costs in a judgment upon an insurance policy, although the contract was made before the Act of 1913, are adhered to.

For other cases, see Costs and Fees, II. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(January 21, 1918.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Douglas County in favor of plaintiff in an action on a policy insuring against loss of property by burglary, theft, or larceny. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stout, Rose, & Wells, for appellant:

The evidence shows nothing more than the disappearance of the ring. It is insufficient, either under the express stipulation of the contract or the general rules of evidence, to sustain the finding that the ring was lost by burglary, theft, or larceny.

The contract was made and the loss occurred before § 3212 of the Revised Statutes of 1913 was enacted. If construed to authorize the taxation of an attorney's fee, it will impair the obligation of the contract and violate § 10, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States, and § 16 of the Bill of Rights in the Constitution of Nebraska.

Sedgwick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The policy upon which this action was brought insured against the direct loss of the property described "by burglary, theft, or larceny." The plaintiff alleged that the diamond ring insured was stolen, and recovered a verdict and judgment in the district court for Douglas county for the value thereof.

1. The defendant contends that the evidence that the ring was stolen was not sufficient to justify the court in submitting that question to the jury. The evidence is not conflicting, and established that the plaintiff's wife wore the ring the evening of May 28, 1912, and at night placed it in a jewel box with other jewelry in her room on the second floor of the residence. The box was provided with a lock, and she left the key in the lock. She had no occasion to wear the ring again for something over a month, and then discovered that it had been taken from the box. In the meantime a servant girl who had been in her employ for about two weeks had suddenly left her upon one day's notice, and although she had mailed a postal card from Salt Lake City, Utah, to another girl in the plaintiff's employ, it gave no information as to her intentions for the future, and she has not been located since. This girl had had the care of the room in which the ring was left, and was in that room in the absence of the plaintiff or his wife. She had no money when she left, and borrowed a dollar to pay for taking her trunk to the station, and was paid the balance of her wages, $13.60, by the plaintiff's check, which was cashed at a drug store. She had informed the plaintiff's wife that she intended to go to Los Angeles. The defendant company and the police were immediately notified when the loss of the ring was discovered, and although search was made in the pawnshops of the city the ring was not discovered. The policy contained the provision: "The mere disappearance of an article or money shall not be deemed sufficient evidence of its loss by burglary, theft, or larceny."

The defendant relies upon Duschenes v. National Surety Co. 79 Misc. 232, 139 N. Y. Supp. 881, and other similar cases. In that case the provision of the policy relied upon was: "The assured shall also produce direct and affirmative evidence that the loss of the article or articles for which claim is made was due to the commission of a burglary, theft, or larceny; the disappearance of such article or articles not to be deemed such evidence."

The evidence was not entirely identical with that in the case at bar, but it was quite similar, and the court said: "No direct or affirmative evidence has been presented of any theft or larceny. . . . In order to protect itself from claims under the policy for loss of the articles covered by the policy by reason of some other cause than burglary, theft, or larceny, the company has provided that the insured must produce, not circumstantial, but direct and affirmative, evidence of the wrong;" and decided that the evidence was not sufficient to support a verdict. Under a policy containing the same language, the supreme court of Pennsylvania held that quite similar evidence would support the finding that the article was stolen. The court said: "This contention gives to the words 'direct and affirmative evidence' a meaning so severely technical that if this meaning alone can be given them, a policy containing the provision we have here would avail the assured only in the rarest and most exceptional cases,—so exceptional that the average person would hardly think the contingency in which the policy could operate worth guarding against. . . . To limit the assured's right to recovery to cases where the corpus delicti can be proved by direct testimony—that is, by the testimony of witnesses who saw the actual taking—would make the policy next to valueless."

The court refused to construe the words "direct and affirmative evidence" literally, as it could not be supposed that the parties to the contract so understood them. Miller v. Massachusetts Bonding & Ins. Co. 247 Pa. 182, L.R.A.1915D, 615, 93 Atl. 320. These words are not in the contract under consideration. Indeed, the language we have to construe is much more liberal. It is true that if larceny, which is the gist of the action, is sufficiently established by this evidence, the company's risk is a hazardous one. Such a contract would make it easy to manufacture a case against the company. The husband might remove the ring and secrete it until the litigation was over, and the wife could then in good faith make the same proof that she has made in this case. The question is therefore a difficult one. The company may, if it desires, assume such risks as are here indicated, and to hold that under this contract it has done so presents to our minds the less difficulty than to hold otherwise. The husband was a witness in the case and submitted to cross-examination, and his evidence seems frank and fair, as does also the evidence of the wife. When, as in this case, the company selects for such insurance a family of high standing in the community, the insured being a man of well-known and unquestionable character, by so doing the risk is minimized. It seems more probable that both parties to this contract understood the difficulties in making proof of larceny in many cases, and that proof of the facts and circumstances from which larceny might justly be inferred, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, would require the matter to be submitted to the jury.

2. The defendant also complains of the allowance of an attorney's fee and taxing the same as costs against the defendant. The contract of insurance was made before the enactment of the Statute of 1913 (Laws 1913, chap. 234; Rev. Stat. 1913, § 3212), providing for such attorney's fee, and it is earnestly insisted that to apply that statute to litigation upon contracts made before its enactment impairs the obligation of the contract. The reasons advanced for this contention on the part of the defendant, and the manner in which they are presented in this brief, might well cause us to hesitate if the question was an open one. Nye-Schneider-Fowler Co. v. Bridges, H. & Co. 98 Neb. 863, 155 N. W. 235; Ward v. Bankers' Life Co. 99 Neb. 812, 157 N. W. 1017. The decisions in these cases are based upon the proposition that the statute affects the remedy only, and to change the taxation of costs, even if it results in increasing the amount of costs, does not change the liability provided for in the contract, but only affects the method of enforcing that liability. If the contract is complied with, no costs are taxed against the company. If litigation becomes necessary to determine the liability, the costs result from the litigation, and not from any construction of the contract. To suggest that the statute relates only to litigation upon contracts of a particular nature, and not litigation generally, presents a distinction of more or less difficulty; but that has already been determined in the cases above cited,—a conclusion that we do not now feel at liberty to depart from.

The judgment of the District Court is in harmony with these conclusions, and is affirmed.

Duress — threatened prosecution — recovery of money.

1. Sufficient duress to warrant recovery of money is shown where it is paid by a physician to protect his good name when threatened by an alleged officer with prosecution for abortion upon one who is stated to be dying, and to have made before becoming unconscious a written statement against the physician, which is in possession of the officer, where all the alleged facts are false, although no proceeding has been commenced or immediate arrest or imprisonment threatened.

For other cases, see Duress, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Case — action to recover money extorted.

2. Violation of a criminal statute against extortion creates a right of action in favor of the victim to recover the property secured.

For other cases, see Assumpsit, II. c. 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Duress — compounding felony — recovering money.

3. Money paid under duress may be recovered although it was paid to compound a felony.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Lewis County dismissing an action brought to recover an amount alleged to have been unlawfully extorted from plaintiff by defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. N. Hart, George W. Wilson, and Wedmark & Grimm for appellant.

Messrs. Herman Allen and Hayden, Langhorne, & Metzger, for respondent:

A mere threat to imprison, without an actual arrest, does not constitute duress.

Bodine v. Morgan, 37 N. J. Eq. 426; Thorn v. Pinkham, 84 Me. 101, 30 Am. St. Rep. 335, 24 Atl. 718; Cornwall v. Anderson, 85 Wash. 374, 148 Pac. 1; Thorne v. Farrar, 57 Wash. 441, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 385, 135 Am. St. Rep. 995, 107 Pac. 347.

Threats of imprisonment, not accompanied with the statement that the prosecution has been commenced, do not constitute duress.

The true test for determining whether or not a penal statute confers a cause of action for private injuries resulting from the breach seems to be intention. That is, whether the intention of the law is to confer a right upon individuals in addition to creating a new public offense.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court: of the sum of $1,025 alleged to have been unlawfully extorted from him by the defendant, Campbell, and also the sum of $125 as special damages incidental thereto. The cause proceeded to trial in the superior court for Lewis county, sitting with a jury, resulting in a judgment of dismissal rendered by the court upon the motion of the defendant's counsel at the close of the plaintiff's evidence. The motion and judgment were rested upon the ground that the evidence introduced in the plaintiff's behalf was not sufficient to support any recovery against the defendant, in that it conclusively showed that appellant voluntarily paid the money to the defendant. From this disposition of the cause the plaintiff has appealed to this court.

Appellant is a physician practising his profession in Portland, Oregon. Respondent is a physician practising his profession at Little Falls, in this state, some 70 miles distant from Portland. On December 26, 1912, a young man and a young woman called at appellant's office in Portland and requested him to examine her with a view of determining certainly whether or not she was pregnant; they believing that she was then probably in that condition. Appellant was then given to understand that, should he find the young woman pregnant, they desired that he perform an abortion upon her. Appellant consented to examine the young woman, but positively refused to perform any abortion upon her. His examination convinced him that she was pregnant, and he so advised them. He then charged her $5 for making the examination. No abortion was performed upon her by appellant, and nothing further was ever done by him for her. Appellant was not acquainted with either the young man or the young woman, but from conversation then had with her learned that she lived at Castle Rock, and was soon going to Little Falls to work. Appellant was well known in Portland, having lived there thirty-three years, and had built up a good practice there in his profession. On January 6, 1913; eleven days after the visit of the young woman to his office, appellant received from respondent through the mail the following letter:

Dear Dr.:—

A young lady lays dying from septic condition and incomplete abortion. She has made a full confession, you are charged with the crime. The confession is in my possession. In event of her death it will be turned over to the police. Confession is witnessed. I do not think she can last more than a day or so, judging by her present condition.

I am very truly,

[Signed] Dr. R. H. Campbell,
Little Falls,
Wa.

January 4/12.

While the letter, upon its face, does not state to whom it was addressed, it came to appellant through the mail, addressed upon the envelop to him, in apparently the same handwriting as the letter, the postmark showing that it had been mailed at Little Falls. The figures "12" upon the letter, indicating the year, manifestly mean 13, since it was written after the visit of the young woman to appellant's office in Portland, which occurred, as we have seen, on December 26, 1912. Appellant was then wholly unacquainted with respondent. Remembering the visit of the young woman to his office a short time previous, and remembering that he had then learned that she was going to Little Falls to work, appellant concluded that the letter had reference to her.

What appellant did and what occurred thereafter may be stated in appellant's own language from his testimony given upon the trial as follows:

Q. When you received that letter you may state what you did.

A. Well, I immediately called up my wife at that time and told her about the letter.

Q. Now, what effect did this letter have upon your mind?

A. Why, the effect was somebody was putting up blackmail, or a job, as I would call it.

Q. Now, after talking with your wife on the telephone, what did you do next?

A. I waited for my wife to come to the office, and we talked the matter over, and she advised me to call up this Dr. Campbell on the telephone, if possible.

A. I had to go to the long-distance office. The lines were somewhat out of order on account of the storms at that time.

Q. Just state what conversation you had with Dr. Campbell on the telephone.

A. Why, I told Dr. Campbell this was Dr. Bertschinger. I told him I received the letter from him that morning, and told (asked) him what the meaning of the letter was. He told me the letter speaks for itself, and advised me to come over there. We could not carry a conversation on very distinctly as it was very hard to hear. . . . Advised me to come over, and told me what train to take. I wasn't posted on the trains, and he told me to take the train leaving about 2 o'clock. I took that train L.R.A.1918C.

over there, and when I got there I met him just as he was going into his house, by the gate. I arrived in Little Falls about 5 o'clock, and we got to talking about the matter and I asked him what the meaning of the letter was. . . . I wanted to find out what kind of a proposition I was up against; that was all, it looked like a piece of blackmail of some kind or shape to me. I had no reason to believe anything but that. I didn't know if any girl was in league with Dr. Campbell in the proposition, or whether something else had been done or what. . . . I asked about the girl, and I wanted to see her. He said, "There is not much for you to see here." She was lying unconscious and liable to draw her last breath, and no chance to see her. Finally he told me he had her in his house, and laughed at me and said he had me just where he wanted me. . . . He threatened to have me arrested, turn me over to the authorities.

Q. What did he say in reference to the official capacity of himself?

A. Well, that came later on. I then challenged him to take it up with the authorities or I would take it up myself, and then he told me it was no use to make any fuss over it, as he was the health officer there, and the best thing I could do was to settle with him, and in the event of death he could sign the death certificate; he was health officer there and the only physician in the town.

Q. What else did he say?

A. . . . When I spoke of taking it up with the authorities myself, he then told me I had better not do that, I better settle the proposition with him, and first he asked me to pay the price of the nurse, which was $25. That I paid him in cash at the time. Then after that, I guess he thought I was a good subject, and he again said for a thousand dollars he would protect me no matter what the outcome would be. . . . Under the circumstances I reasoned, if he had such a confession, although it was a frame-up, that if the girl did it, which I didn't know whether she did or not, I would be liable if she did; he might use it against me. Rather than have a case of that kind I would sacrifice a thousand dollars and then investigate and find out and fight him afterwards. . . . I told him I could not pay any thousand dollars; I had just come back from the East on a trip, and I told him I could not raise a thousand dollars. "You will have it here in two hours," he said. I told him I could not raise that in twenty-four hours; I could raise $500 and give him my note for the balance. He said, "No, no notes and no drafts, a thousand dollars in cash, in gold." That was the only option I had. We walked down to the depot. I waited four or five hours. The train wasn't on schedule, and got home along about 2 o'clock in the morning. I told my wife of the conversation I had with Dr. Campbell, and she advised me to raise the money by mortgage or some way and go over there and protect my name rather than face this thing; it was a blackmail proposition, but rather than take a chance of having that on me, I had better pay a thousand dollars. So I thought of Mr. McKensie, a friend of mine, and through him we raised a thousand dollars and took it over to him.

Q. When you left Dr. Campbell did he give you any length of time in which to raise the thousand dollars?

A. Twenty-four hours specifically. . . . He said to have it there in twenty-four hours.

Q. When did you get back to Little Falls?

A. We took the train at home that day at 2 o'clock and arrived there about 5.

Q. Who went with you?

A. My wife.

Q. Your wife at that time?

A. Yes. . . .

Q. Now, when you got back to Little Falls you say that it was about 5 o'clock. Just tell the jury what happened then.

A. My wife and I approached his house, and he came out as we got to the gate, in his shirt sleeves; he didn't have a coat on, and he evidently was expecting us, and before we got to the porch of the house he came and opened the door to receive us, and as we entered the house he told my wife to go into the room to the left, and took me straight over to where he had his office in the residence, and we had a short talk there, and he said the girl was about the same, and she was still unconscious, and that he didn't know whether she would draw her last breath any minute, and he wanted to know if I had the money. I said yes, I had it there. By the way, I forgot to mention this: The day before he said he would surrender this confession from the girl if I paid over this thousand dollars. This he refused to do the second day. He didn't give us the confession, but he kept the money. That is, after a little talk I said my wife had the money. He wanted me to get the money. I told him my wife had it, that we had to mortgage our home, and that my wife had the money. . . .

A. When I told him my wife had the money,—really the money was coming out of her money as well as mine,—he sort of hesitated and said, "Well, we will have her come in," and she came into the room and asked him what the money was paid for, and he said, "To keep that man out of the pen," L.R.A.1918C.

and there was some more conversation which wasn't material, but she counted out the money to him. My wife gave him that money in $20 gold pieces. . . . After he had the money he patted us on the back and said the danger was all over; the girl wasn't in a very serious condition at all; he thought everything would come out right, and in the event of her death he would protect us. We then left Dr. Campbell's place and went home. . . .

Q. State whether or not you paid the money by reason of the fact that you were afraid of being prosecuted.

A. Yes; the only reason I did pay it.

The jury would have been fully warranted in believing all of the facts above stated had the cause been submitted to it.

The principal contention of counsel for respondent, and apparently the conclusion reached by the trial court, is rested upon the theory that it must be determined, as a matter of law, from these facts, that appellant cannot recover because the money was not paid under such legal duress as the law requires to be proven to avoid a contract, in that appellant was not charged with the commission of a crime in any proceeding instituted in court, nor was he threatened with immediate arrest or imprisonment. In other words, counsel invoke the rules applicable to cases where claims of right are asserted in good faith, accompanied by threats of civil or criminal proceedings made in good faith, looking to the enforcement of such asserted rights, and where the contract, settlement, or compromise involved would not be invalid for want of consideration, apart from the question of coercion. Counsel rely principally upon the law as announced in our decision in Ingebrigt v. Seattle Taxicab & Transfer Co. 78 Wash. 433, 139 Pac. 188. In that case the plaintiff sought to set aside a settlement claimed to have been made by him with the defendant under duress, for money alleged to have been unlawfully appropriated by him, and to recover damages measured by the value of the consideration he gave to effect the settlement. Judgment of nonsuit was rendered at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, upon motion of the defendant, the case being taken from the jury, which judgment was affirmed by this court. No criminal prosecution was commenced; it was only threatened. Judge Gose, speaking for the court, at page 436 of 78 Wash. of the reported decision, said: "Under the appellant's testimony, he had unlawfully appropriated money which belonged to respondent. The respondent had a right to say to him that, if he did not settle, it would commence a civil action. It also had a right to point out to him that he was subject to a criminal prosecution. Under his own testimony, the good faith of the charge that he was subject to criminal prosecution cannot be questioned. It is not duress for one who in good faith believes that he has been wronged to threaten the wrongdoer with a civil suit; and if the wrong includes a violation of the criminal law, it is not duress to threaten him with a criminal prosecution."

The learned writer of the opinion cites as lending support to the conclusion reached therein the following decisions: Hilborn v. Bucknam, 78 Me. 482, 57 Am. Rep. 816, 7 Atl. 272; Bodine v. Morgan, 37 N. J. Eq. 426; Thorn v. Pinkham, 84 Me. 101, 30 Am. St. Rep. 335, 24 Atl. 718; Buchanan v. Sahlein, 9 Mo. App. 552; Sulzner v. Cappeau-Lemley & M. Co. 234 Pa. 162, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 421, 83 Atl. 103; Loan & Protection Asso. v. Holland, 63 Ill. App. 58; Elston v. Chicago, 40 Ill. 514, 89 Am. Dec. 361; Beath v. Chapoton, 115 Mich. 506, 69 Am. St. Rep. 589, 73 N. W. 806; Williams v. Stewart, 115 Ga. 864, 42 S. E. 256; McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Miller, 54 Neb. 644, 74 N. W. 1061; Alexander v. Pierce, 10 N. H. 494; Englert v. Dale, 25 N. D. 587, 142 N. W. 169; Harrison Twp. v. Addison, 176 Ind. 389, 96 N. E. 146. It may be said, speaking generally, that all these cited decisions deal with contracts, settlements, or compromises which, within themselves, apart from the question of duress, were not invalid for want of lawful consideration, and also that in making the demands and threats which brought about the contract, settlement, or compromise the party charged with duress believed, in good faith, that he was making a lawful demand and threat, looking to the enforcement of a right possessed either by himself or those for whom he was acting. We notice here, however, those of these decisions which may seem to deal with situations not wholly of this nature.

In Sulzner v. Cappeau-Lemley & M. Co. 234 Pa. 162, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 421, 83 Atl. 103, the demand involved was made for property which the one making the demand believed in good faith that his company was entitled to, but the alleged threat was that the son of the one upon whom the demand was made would be imprisoned if the demand was not complied with. Settlement was thereupon effected, a valuable consideration passing from each party to the other. No proceedings having been commenced nor warrant of arrest issued and no actual arrest of the son attempted, the evidence was held, as a matter of law, not sufficient to support a verdict of recovery of the fruits of the settlement, upon the ground L.R.A.1918C.

of duress. That case differs from the others in that the threat was not made directly against the one upon whom the demand was made. The contract, however, was not invalid for want of valuable considerations passing from each of the parties to the other, and rested upon a demand made in good faith.

In Englert v. Dale, 25 N. D. 587, 142 N. W. 169, we have a somewhat similar situation, in that the alleged threat was to have the son of the one upon whom the demand was made imprisoned if the demand was not complied with. The demand was, however, made in the assertion of a right which the one making it believed in good faith that he was entitled to. That case was tried and decided by the court without a jury, and it was found, as a question of fact, that the mortgage in question, claimed to have been procured by duress, was voluntarily executed.

The decisions in Harrison Twp. v. Addison, 176 Ind. 389, 96 N. E. 146, and McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Miller, 54 Neb. 644, 74 N. W. 1061, were rested upon the ground that there was no duress in law justifying the avoiding of the contracts, which were settlements of claims made in good faith for misappropriation of moneys. Another reason pointed out by the courts in both of these cases why the plaintiffs could not recover was that the contracts of settlement were unenforceable as being against public policy, in that they were, in effect, contracts to obstruct the administration of the criminal laws. Nothing said by the courts in those decisions, however, suggests that a contract, unenforceable as against public policy, might not also be void because of its being made under duress. If made under duress such as to render it void, the question of it being unenforceable because against public policy would not be of any consequence in so far as the recovery upon a right growing out of the transaction is concerned.

The decisions above noticed and relied upon by counsel for respondent deal with situations quite different from that here involved. In each of them, as already noticed, the one making the demand and accused of coercion was seeking to enforce rights which he, in good faith, believed he possessed, either for himself or for those for whom he was acting. The contracts and settlements so effected were not unlawful in themselves so far as the settlement of the private rights in question were concerned, nor were they invalid for want of consideration. Here we have a case where the respondent had no shadow of right to rest his demand upon. Not only did no right exist in him to make such demand, but no right existed in anyone to make such demand. He could not have made the demand in good faith if the evidence introduced in appellant's behalf is true, and we must so regard it for present purposes. There is something else in this case beside the question of duress, as such question is presented and determined in cases like Ingebrigt v. Seattle Taxicab & Transfer Co. supra, and those therein cited and here relied upon by counsel for respondent.

The presumption of want of duress in the making of contracts, settlements, or compromises under the circumstances shown in those decisions does not apply to the payment of money under the circumstances here shown. Where contracts, settlements, and compromises are made between parties where there is a fair show of legal right, and where the contract, settlement, or compromise is not manifestly unfair, and is made in response to a demand made in good faith, it, of course, should require the most convincing proof of duress in order to warrant its avoidance on that ground; while the very fact that one yields to a demand made upon him without the shadow of right, and one which, under no circumstances, could be made in good faith, suggests, of itself, some degree of duress, inducing the yielding to such demand.

Counsel for respondent cite, and in some measure rely upon, our decisions in Thorne v. Farrar, 57 Wash. 441, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 385, 135 Am. St. Rep. 995, 107 Pac. 347, and Cornwall v. Anderson, 85 Wash. 363, 148 Pac. 1. Both of these cases were tried by the court without a jury, and the questions of duress were therein disposed of as questions of fact, and not as questions of law. In the Thorne Case, supra, Judge Gose, speaking for the court at page 444 of 57 Wash. said: "We are persuaded that the promptings of conscience, and not threats, moved him to marry the respondent and make the reparation that honorable conduct demanded."

In the Cornwall Case, supra, this court refused to disturb the findings of the trial court that appellant had executed the notes in question freely and voluntarily. In each of those cases there was a yielding to a demand made in good faith.

In much of the argument advanced by counsel for respondent they seemed to forget that this cause was being tried in the superior court before a jury whose province it was to decide the questions of fact involved. Now, keeping in mind the facts as shown by the evidence introduced in appellant's behalf, which we must, for present purposes, regard as true, let us notice some of the decisions dealing with demands which, in whole or in part, were without right and known to be such by those making the demand. We think it will appear therefrom that the courts do not require such convincing proof of overcoming the free will of the person upon whom the demand is made as where it is made in good faith, with some show of legal right, and a recognition of that right by the person who yields thereto. In other words, there is running through all the decisions relied upon by counsel for respondent in this case the element of presumption that when one yields to a demand made upon him in good faith, accompanied by a fair show of legal right in the one making the demand, he does not yield because of duress in the legal sense. The case is manifestly quite different where one yields to demands made upon him without any show of legal right or good faith upon the part of the one making the demand. Indeed, the contrary presumption as to duress in such cases would seem more in agreement with common experience and common sense, since it would seem that one would not ordinarily yield to such a demand except he be influenced by some present overpowering necessity, viewed from his standpoint.

In Pemberton v. Williams, 87 Ill. 15, the evidence tended to show that the plaintiff was compelled to pay more than was plainly due upon the purchase price of a land contract to procure a deed, and that he was induced to do so in order to complete an advantageous resale of the land by him to another, this being known to the one who made the demand upon him for the excess amount. The duress involved manifestly consisted only of the necessity of his procuring a deed to the land in order that he might make the resale. The court directed the jury to find against him in an action brought by him to recover the excess so paid by him. In holding this to be error, Justice Breese, speaking for the supreme court, said: "It is very clear, we think, the court, in so interposing, invaded the rightful province of the jury. There was testimony before the jury tending to show that there were only $50 due on the land, and when the appellee demanded $365 as his due before he would deliver a deed, it was a fair question for the jury whether under the circumstances by which appellant was surrounded, by the sale of the land to Slinglove, which falling through a good sale might be lost, the payment was not involuntary—made under a sort of moral duress. The jury should have been left free to pass on that point."

Beath v. Chapoton, 115 Mich. 506, 69 Am. St. Rep. 589, 73 N. W. 806, was an action to recover upon notes executed in settlement of a charge of embezzlement.

The evidence seemed to show that the notes were given under a threat of criminal proceedings, for an amount greater than the sum embezzled. While the court held that, in so far as the giving of the notes in settlement, to the extent of the amount actually embezzled, was concerned, it was, as a matter of law, not a duress, it was held to be for the jury to decide to what extent the notes were given without consideration, and to render a verdict accordingly. In so deciding, Chief Justice Grant, speaking for the court, at page 510 of 115 Mich., said: "There is no evidence of any threats or restraint at that time, no prosecution had been commenced, nor was there any statement that any had been commenced, and he was free to go and come as he chose. It therefore appears that Chapoton, after the alleged charge and threats were made, took ample time to consider it, and then voluntarily settled by giving these notes. This is not the course pursued by a man conscious of his innocence and in the possession of his faculties. There is nothing to show that he was young or old, inexperienced, feeble in body or mind, or unable to indignantly deny and resist a false charge of embezzlement and felony. Under this record the only question to be submitted to the jury with regard to him was whether there was a failure, . . . in whole or in part, for the notes. Under the above decisions, he was liable upon them to the extent of moneys appropriated by him, if any were so appropriated; and it was the province of the jury to determine the amount. If he had appropriated none of the plaintiff's money, of course the notes were without consideration, and void."

In that case there was no commencement of any criminal proceedings nor any threat of immediate arrest. That case seems to hold that, in so far as the consideration failed, there could be no recovery upon the notes, regardless of the question of duress.

March v. Bricklayers' & P. Union, 79 Conn. 7, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1198, 118 Am. St. Rep. 127, 63 Atl. 291, 6 Ann. Cas. 848, was an action brought by the plaintiff against the union to recover $100 extorted from him under a threat of withdrawing his employees and thereby injuring his business. Here we have a case like the one before us, wherein the money was exacted without any legal right whatever, and without any possibility of its having been demanded in good faith. In awarding recovery of the money so exacted, Justice Prentice, speaking for the court, said: "The most elemental principles of justice and right, which have by universal consent been adopted into the common law, suffice for a conclusion that money cannot be lawfully exacted of a man in the manner here successful."

Joannin v. Ogilvie, 49 Minn. 564, 16 L.R.A. 376, 32 Am. St. Rep. 581, 52 N. W. 217, was an action to recover money paid by the plaintiff to free his real property from a lien claim filed against it without any right whatever. It was there held that this was not such a voluntary payment on his part as to prevent his recovery of the money from the lien claimant who had thus induced its payment.

Chicago v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 218 Ill. 40, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 770, 75 N. E. 803, was an action by the insurance company to recover from the city payments made by it to the city upon demand for water rent due by previous owners or occupants of the building, and for which the insurance company was in no way liable, induced by threats of the city authorities that the water would be shut off until this demand was satisfied. This was held not to be a voluntary payment on the part of the insurance company, but that it was one made under duress such as enabled it to recover the money so paid.

Goddard v. Bulow, 1 Nott & M'C. 45, 9 Am. Dec. 663, was an action to recover excessive freight charges demanded as a condition that the freight be received and transported, the one upon whom the demand was made being then under great necessity of having the goods transported. This was held an exaction without legal right to the extent of giving the plaintiff a right of action for the recovery of the excess so paid, upon the theory that it was not voluntarily paid.

These are but a few of the many decisions which could be cited showing that the presumption against duress which the courts indulge in touching contracts and settlements induced by demands made in good faith are not applicable to the facts appearing in this record.

Our criminal statutes relating to extortion and providing punishment therefor, we think, also lend support to appellant's contention. Section 2610, Rem. & Bal. Code, so far as applicable here, reads: "Every person, who, under circumstances not amounting to robbery, shall extort or gain any money, property or advantage . . . by means of force or any threat, either (1) to accuse any person of a crime, or . . . to expose or impute to any person . . . disgrace, . . . shall be guilty of extortion and shall be punished by imprisonment in the state penitentiary for not more than five years." Rem. & Bal. Code, § 2610.

made against appellant, and a threat to cause him to be criminally prosecuted, and also a threat to expose him to disgrace, respondent having the apparent means at hand to so render appellant serious injury, though he be innocent, if he did not pay the money demanded, seems too plain for argument. It is true that this is a general criminal statute, and, of course, was enacted for the benefit of the public, but, since the extortion here defined is a crime against the person and works to his personal injury as well as that of the public, the commission of it would create a cause of action in favor of the person so injured. The right to recover money so extorted was learnedly reviewed by Justice Ailshie, speaking for the supreme court of Idaho, in Wilbur v. Blanchard, 22 Idaho, 517, 126 Pac. 1069. The plaintiff in that case, under a threat of criminal prosecution, paid $2,150 in settlement of an embezzlement charge made against him, he having embezzled only $150. The criminal extortion statute of Idaho is in substance the same as ours. The trial court instructed the jury, as stated in the opinion, in substance as follows: "That the defendant cannot defend this action upon the mere ground that the charge of theft which he made against plaintiff was true, or, in other words, the truth or falsity of that charge alone is wholly immaterial to this inquiry, as one is not justified in extorting money from even one guilty of crime, provided you find any extortion was practised."

The jury returned a verdict for $2,000, evidently finding that only $150 was appropriated by the plaintiff. In affirming this verdict and judgment and noticing numerous authorities touching the question of duress, the learned justice, among other things, said: "Now, reverting again to the provisions of our statute, we find that the fear 'such as will constitute extortion may be induced by threat,' and that such threat may be simply 'to accuse' the party of a crime. It is apparent that money or property might as readily be obtained by one who is in fact guilty of the crime by threatening to accuse him thereof as from one not guilty of a crime who is threatened with such accusation. It seems to us that justice demands that no one should be allowed to extort money from another which is not justly due or owing to him by overpowering the will and mental faculties of his adversary under threats of arrest or imprisonment, even though the party may in fact be guilty of such crime. Two wrongs do not make a right, and the fact that a man is guilty of larceny does not justify the man from whom the property has been stolen to use that fact as a means or instrument of obtaining money or property from the thief which is not justly due and owing."

Manifestly, the judgment was affirmed upon the theory that the jury could well find that there was no duress in plaintiff's yielding to the demand, to the extent of his paying the $150 actually due from him; indeed, it might have been so held as a matter of law; yet the jury could also well find that the additional $2,000 was paid under duress. Manifestly, the court considered the question of duress, as to the $2,000 so paid, as one of fact for the jury to decide.

It was suggested in oral argument, though not advanced in the briefs as a defense, that the payment of this money, under the circumstances as shown by appellant's evidence, was, in effect, the compounding of a felony, and for that reason the judgment of dismissal was not erroneous. This, upon the theory that the agreement was so tainted with wrong and illegality that the courts will not lend their aid to the enforcement of the right claimed by appellant. It hardly seems likely that respondent would, upon a new trial, care to invoke this defense, since it would imply that he was himself equally guilty of compounding the crime with which he charged appellant. That would seem to be an admission on his part that the money was received as well as paid, for that purpose. But even that theory would still leave open the question of appellant having paid the money under duress. Plainly a contract or settlement amounting to the compounding of a crime could be void because of duress as well as unenforceable because of being against public policy. If void because of duress it was not a binding contract or settlement under which appellant could retain the fruits thereof, even though it was also a contract which, but for the duress, would have been against public policy, and as such could not be the foundation of any right to be asserted in the courts. The trial judge did not take the case from the jury upon this ground, but solely because he decided as a question of law there was not such duress as entitled appellant to recover the money paid. This is rendered plain by remarks of the judge, made in announcing his decision, and preserved in this record. Clearly, it would have been erroneous for the trial court to have dismissed the action upon the ground that the payment of the money was for the compounding of a felony, in view of the evidence produced in appellant's behalf. This question will not likely arise upon a new trial for the reason above indicated; and besides, respondent has pleaded that the money was paid to him for a lawful purpose. The question is here noticed only in the light of the present status of the case to show that this suggested theory does not support the judgment of dismissal.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to the Superior Court for a new trial.

Contracts for the suppression of criminal prosecutions being unlawful, the courts will not lend aid to carry them out, but, in general, will leave the parties where they have placed themselves; as, being in pari delicto, potior est conditio possidentis. Where, however, the contract is made under circumstances of duress, oppression, or undue influence, the courts will permit the recovery of money paid on such contracts, or even, in some cases, cancel the obligations or conveyances made. This appears to be mainly upon the theory that where there is duress, oppression, or undue influence, the parties are not in pari delicto; but it is also based to some extent upon public policy, which would prevent the extortioner and oppressor from retaining the results of his wrongful act.

It is a general rule that money paid to suppress a threatened prosecution for a crime cannot be recovered back. Collins v. Blantern (1767) 2 Wils. 341, 95 Eng. Reprint, 847 (obiter); Mervin v. Huntington (1817) 2 Conn. 209; Arter v. Byington (1867) 44 Ill. 468; Harrison Twp. v. Addison (1911) 176 Ind. 389, 96 N. E. 146; Harmon v. Harmon (1873) 61 Me. 227; Hilborn v. Lane (1880) 80 L.R.A.1918C.

(Pa.) 428; Comstock v. Tupper (1878) 50 Vt. 596; Wood v. Adams (1905) 10 Ont. L. Rep. 631; Chipman v. Whitman (1912) 11 East. L. R. (Can.) 313.

"Whoever is a party to an unlawful contract, if he hath once paid the money stipulated to be paid in pursuance thereof, he shall not have the help of a court to fetch it back again; you shall not have a right of action when you come into a court of justice in this . . . manner to recover it back." Wilmot, Ch. J., in Collins v. Blantern (1767) 2 Wils. 341, 95 Eng. Reprint, 847, in holding that there could be no recovery on a bond given to secure the plaintiff for a note he gave a prosecutor for not appearing and giving evidence of perjury.

Similarly, one was not permitted to recover back what he had paid on a note given to suppress a prosecution for embezzlement. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Ferrell (1899) 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1201, 48 S. W. 1078.

And a horse delivered in part payment of the money agreed upon could not be recovered. Dixon v. Olmstead (1837) 9 Vt. 310, 31 Am. Dec. 629.

In Ingebrigt v. Seattle Taxicab & Transfer Co. (1914) 78 Wash. 433, 139 Pac. 188, cited in BERTSCHINGER v. CAMPBELL, ante, 65, the court exonerated the defendants from any wrongful act in taking from their employee accused of embezzlement a transfer of a truck in settlement, although they pointed out to him at the time his liability to arrest and prosecution; and he was not permitted to recover his property.

It may be noted that it was held in Mayer v. Hoffman (1886) 67 Wis. 279, 30 N. W. 355, that money paid when under arrest on a charge of bastardy, to settle the matter, without threats, may not be recovered back.

(A fortiori where the defendants, at the plaintiff's request, paid money they owed him to a third party to compound a felony with which the plaintiff was charged, he could not recover it from them. Leonard v. Travis (1863) 6 Allen (Mass.) 129.)

Duress, oppression, and undue influence.

The rule, however, is subject to this qualification, that if the payment has been extorted or induced by duress, oppression, or undue influence, it can be recovered back. Wilbur v. Blanchard (1912) 22 Idaho, 517, 126 Pac. 1069; Schommer v. Farwell (1869) 56 Ill. 542; Baldwin v. Hutchison (1893) 8 Ind. App. 454, 35 N. E. 711; Nelson v. Leszczynski-Clark Co. (1913) 177 Mich. 517, 143 N. W. 606; Klein v. Pederson (1902) 65 Neb. 452, 91 N. W. 281; Richardson v. Duncan (1826) 3 N. H. 508; Severance v. Kimball (1836) 8 N. H. 386; Fillman v. Ryon (1895) 168 Pa. 484, 32 Atl. 89; BERTSCHINGER v. CAMPBELL; Heckman v. Swartz (1885) 64 Wis. 48, 24 N. W. 473.

Thus, money was recovered, as paid under duress, when it was extorted under a threat of prosecution for larceny (Wilbur v. Blanchard (Idaho) supra), where it was paid for release by one in prison under a charge of embezzlement, and while he was refused access to a magistrate (Schommer v. Farwell (1869) 56 Ill. 542, supra), or when paid by one under arrest and without counsel (Severance v. Kimball (1836) 8 N. H. 386, supra).

In Heckman v. Swartz (Wis.) supra, it was held that one arrested on a charge of fornication, the purpose of the prosecution being to compel a settlement, who pays money for his release, pays it under duress of imprisonment, and may recover it back.

So, a promissory note payable the next day, made under threats of immediate arrest and prosecution for embezzlement and grand larceny, its payment being forced by attachment, was held by the jury to have been given and paid under duress, and the amount was recovered. Nelson v. Leszczynski-Clark Co. (1913) 177 Mich. 517, 143 N. W. 606.

In Fillman v. Ryon (1895) 168 Pa. 484, 32 Atl. 89, the court said: "The plaintiff was arrested on the charge of embezzlement and for the purpose of extorting money from him. The prosecution was abandoned when the purpose of it was accomplished. He parted with his property while under duress by L.R.A.1918C.

imprisonment and threats, and his right to recover it from the wrongdoer cannot, under the circumstances shown, be successfully questioned. We think, too, that as the act of which he complains was obviously unlawful and tortious, he may recover the property obtained by it in this form of action."

In Wilbur v. Blanchard (Idaho) supra, where the plaintiff alleged that the defendant had extorted $2,150 from him by threatening to prosecute him for the crime of larceny, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for $2,000, the court held that this was a finding that $150 had been wrongfully taken by the plaintiff, and that it was proper that the defendant should retain this, the plaintiff recovering back the balance.

Where a settlement of a charge of tearing down and burning a barn was made while the justice was making out a mittimus, by turning over goods later converted into money, it was held to be error to direct a nonsuit on assumption for money had and received, as the question of duress should have been left to the jury. Richardson v. Duncan (1826) 3 N. H. 508, where the court said: "It is now well settled that when there is an arrest for improper purposes, without a just cause; or where there is an arrest for a just cause, but without lawful authority; or where there is an arrest for a just cause, and under lawful authority, for unlawful purposes, it may be construed a duress."

(But fear of criminal prosecution inducing one who received a reward for finding money to return the reward is not compulsion, and he cannot recover back the reward. Felton v. Gregory (1881) 130 Mass. 176.)

Money paid has been similarly recovered back in cases of oppression of the weak and innocent.

Thus, money extorted by threats of a criminal prosecution from one of weak mind, who, as a witness, had testified against the character of the extorter's son, can be recovered back though no proceedings had been begun and there was no ground for them. Baldwin v. Hutchison (1893) 8 Ind. App. 454, 35 N. E. 711.

So, in Klein v. Pederson (1902) 65 Neb. 452, 91 N. W. 281, the plaintiff was held entitled to recover back money paid, where the evidence was sufficient to show that the defendant and another entered into a conspiracy to extort money from the plaintiff by making a false charge that he had sold adulterated butter, and the defendant persuaded the plaintiff to give him money to induce an officer to drop the matter, this being the case of a strong mind taking advantage of a weaker. The court said: "That a party who is in pari delicto cannot make his illegal act the basis of a recovery has been definitely settled by this and many other courts. But where a strong mind takes advantage of a weaker, and by persuasion and influence procures the illegal act, this rule ceases to be applicable. The wrong then rests chiefly, if not solely, on the person by whom it was contrived, and his confederate is regarded as the mere instrument for accomplishing an end not his own. If a party should be allowed immunity under such circumstances he would be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong, and reap a benefit from his own fraud."

In BERTSCHINGER v. CAMPBELL, ante, 65, as will be seen, the court considered that in case of extortion and possible innocence the question of duress should have been left to the jury.

The doctrine of Haynes v. Rudd.

In some of the cases we find the expression "compounding a felony" applied to the circumstances involved; others use the expression, "stifling a criminal prosecution." Probably in from two thirds to three fourths of the cases the facts show clearly that a felony was compounded, and the courts in general appear to apply the doctrine of duress without regard to whether or not there was a technical compounding of a felony; but in Haynes v. Rudd (1886) 102 N. Y. 372, 55 Am. Rep. 815, 7 N. E. 287, the New York court lays down the doctrine that where the contract compounds a felony, duress is immaterial, as in such case the parties are in pari delicto; and that no amount of duress or oppression can alter the case or justify relief. The following year, however, the court granted equitable relief from a contract in which the facts seem similar. (See Schoener v. Lissauer (N. Y.) infra.) And a little later (Adams v. Irving Nat. Bank (N. Y.) infra) permitted the recovery of money back on the ground of undue influence, stating that the question of compounding a felony was not properly raised in the court below.

In Haynes v. Rudd (N. Y.) supra, the plaintiff sought to recover the amount of a promissory note given by him upon the settlement of a claim by the defendant that the plaintiff's son had stolen from him; the note had been transferred before maturity to a third party and the plaintiff had paid it. It was held that duress could not justify recovery. The court said: "While fraud, duress, and undue influence employed in procuring a contract for the payment of money may vitiate and destroy the obligation created, and render it of no effect, and the party who has been compelled to pay money on account thereof may maintain an action to recover the same, such a right does not exist and cannot be enforced where the consideration of the contract, thus made, arises entirely upon or is in any way affected by the compounding of a felony. When this element enters into the contract, it becomes tainted with a corrupt consideration and cannot be enforced. . . .

We cannot agree with the doctrine that if the plaintiff was influenced by the duress of the defendant, and at the same time both parties intended the compounding of a felony, that they were not in pari delicto. It is enough that the vice of compounding a felony was a part of the contract, operating upon the minds of both parties, and thus placing them upon an equality, to render the contract nugatory and of no effect."

In Schoener v. Lissauer (1887) 107 N. Y. 111, 13 N. E. 741, however, the court canceled a mortgage "procured by the defendants by their threats and menaces that unless she gave said mortgage they would cause her son to be sent to the state prison for the offense of larceny and embezzlement, which they charged him with having committed against them when in their employ, and for which he was under arrest and indictment on their complaint, and about to be tried." The court states that the judgment is not in conflict with Haynes v. Rudd.

In Adams v. Irving Nat. Bank (1889) 116 N. Y. 606, 6 L.R.A. 491, 15 Am. St. Rep. 447, 23 N. E. 7, it was held that money might be recovered back which was paid by a wife in consequence of threats and undue influence inducing the fear that if the money was not paid her husband would be arrested and imprisoned for concealing money from his creditors, he being in bankruptcy. The court of appeals refers to various cases of avoiding securities given to save relatives from lawful arrest, and states that the question of compounding a felony was not raised below and was not properly before it.

In Jaeger v. Koenig (1900) 30 Misc. 580, 62 N. Y. Supp. 803, it was held that a payment by a wife to "settle" with the husband's employer for an alleged theft, under a threat that if the payment was not made, he would have her husband arrested, could be recovered back. The court stated that the argument advanced by the defendant, that the moneys in controversy were paid for the purpose of compounding a felony, was without reason, and said: "There is no evidence whatever that a criminal action was ever threatened by defendant, much less of an agreement on his part to abstain from prosecuting it. The reverse, however, is shown, the proof being that a civil suit only was contemplated by the parties when the settlement was effected. But, even had other procedure been contemplated, it would not, in my opinion, have affected plaintiff's right to recover. In the case relied upon to support this proposition, moneys were paid by a father, under an agreement that his son was not to be prosecuted criminally (Haynes v. Rudd (N. Y.) supra), and the proof showed that the moneys were paid voluntarily and without a coercion of force or threats, and the court rested its decision solely on the ground that the consideration mentioned in the contract was entirely affected by the compounding of a felony."

It is not clear how far the New Jersey court meant to go in Jourdan v. Burstow (1909) 76 N. J. Eq. 55, 139 Am. St. Rep. 741, 74 Atl. 124, affirmed in (1911) 78 N. J. Eq. 587, 81 Atl. 1133, where the vice chancellor, in dismissing a bill to recover property conveyed in satisfaction of the maker's embezzlement, said: "The decided weight of the evidence, so far as the facts are concerned, is with the defendants. It goes to sustain the charge of embezzlement and disproves the duress. The only question is the legal one: Whether a man who has actually conveyed property in satisfaction of an embezzlement, admitted to have been committed, can recover it back simply on the ground that the written agreement which he entered into with his employers to make restitution contains a clause against prosecution. Such an agreement is plainly illegal, and its performance could not be compelled. But, if actually performed, the grantor, suing to recover back his property, stands in the same situation that the grantee would have stood in had he sued on the agreement. He is in pari delicto and the maxim is, 'In pari delicto, potior est conditio possidentis.'" The court referred to the statement in Haynes v. Rudd, that the parties were in pari delicto, and said: "Here the doctrine of par delictum was applied as against a third person. A fortiori must it be applied as against the alleged embezzler himself."

Practically the New York courts seem to grant relief about as readily as the courts of other jurisdictions, although technically, according to Haynes v. Rudd, relief is not to be afforded in cases of compounding a felony. In view of the fact that in most of the cases there is no practical doubt that a felony was compounded, it seems either that the New York courts consider that the compounding of a felony is a highly technical affair, or else that they have failed to pay due regard to the actual facts of the cases. That the courts in general will afford relief in cases of compounding a felony where there has been duress is clear from the early ejection case of Worcester v. Eaton (1814) 11 Mass. 377.

In Worcester v. Eaton (Mass.) supra, where a deed was given by a woman in consideration of a release from a charge of receiving stolen goods, Parker, Ch. J., after stating that it had been held in numerous cases that money paid upon such a consideration as compounding a felony could not be recovered, stated: "It will appear that a distinction is maintained between those cases in which one of the parties has, by an illegal act, taken an advantage of and oppressed the other, and those in which it is not possible to distinguish between the parties as to the degree of their criminality."

The doctrine, as laid down by Lord Mansfield, is that, where certain acts are made unlawful by statute, to protect unwary and ignorant people from oppression and extortion, there, although both parties are guilty of violating the law, yet they are not equally guilty, and that, in such cases, the party from whom money is exacted shall recover it back from him who practises the oppression. . . . But that in all acts which are unlawful on account of their immorality, or because they are hostile to public policy, there the parties to the act are in pari delicto and potior est conditio defendantis. . . . If, then, the composition of a felony or of a larceny is an illegal consideration of any promise or obligation for money, the party claiming under such instrument cannot enforce it in a court of justice; nor can the other party, if he has paid it, recover it back again." But he sent the case back for a new trial on the ground that if the deed was extorted by menaces of imprisonment, it would be avoided. And in Worcester v. Eaton (1816) 13 Mass. 371, 7 Am. Dec. 155, the deed was accordingly held for naught.

It will be observed that the court in BERTSCHINGER v. CAMPBELL, ante, 65, considers that if there was duress, the money paid could be recovered, although a felony was compounded. B. B. B.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA EX REL.
GRAHAM SALE

v.
C. O. STAHLMAN, Mayor of Bluefield,
et al.

(— W. Va. —, 94 S. E. 497.)

Municipal corporation — regulating height of buildings.

1. Under a provision of its charter authorizing it "to regulate the height, construction, and inspection" of new buildings erected within its corporate limits, a city cannot prevent the owner of a lot situated in a built-up section and between three and four-story buildings, from erecting a one-story building thereon, by refusal of permission to erect it.

For other cases, see Buildings, I. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — construction of charter.

2. Properly construed, such charter provision confers authority respecting the height of buildings, only to limit or restrict it for the safety of persons and property.

For other cases, see Buildings, I. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — police power.

3. Prevention of the erection of buildings in a city, lower than adjacent and neighboring ones, has no such tendency to prevent danger from fire, or the spreading thereof, as will justify or validate it under the police power of the state.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, II. c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Eminent domain — private use.

4. A limitation upon an owner's use of his property cannot be imposed by law for the benefit of other property owners.

For other cases, see Eminent Domain, III. c, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — ornament.

5. Nor can it be imposed only to effect symmetry or ornamentation of a city, street or section, otherwise than under the power of eminent domain, allowing compensation, if at all.

For other cases, see Eminent Domain, III. c, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

PETITION for a writ of mandamus to compel respondents to give to relator a permit to erect a one-story building on a lot owned by him. Writ awarded.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John Randolph Tucker for petitioner.

Messrs. Ross & Kahle for respondents.

Poffenbarger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Relying upon a provision of its charter (chapter 9, Acts of 1915), found in § 7 thereof, and conferring upon it, among others, the power "to regulate the height, construction, and inspection of all new buildings" thereafter to be erected within its territory, the city of Bluefield has refused to give the relator a permit to erect a building on a lot owned by him, situated in the business section of the city and fronting on Princeton avenue, one of its principal thoroughfares, on the sole ground of its character as to height, his purpose being the erection of a one-story building. By some regulation not fully disclosed in the pleadings, the city endeavors to enforce its policy of prevention of the erection of buildings less than three stories high, in that section, and has refused the permit in pursuance thereof. He seeks a writ of mandamus to compel issuance thereof.

Ordinarily, such charter provisions confer power to limit or restrict the height of buildings, not to require it, as a means of promotion or conservation of the value of adjacent or neighboring property, or attainment of esthetic ideals or purposes of the community or municipal authorities, and their justification and validity rest upon the police power of the state, under which the legislature may directly or indirectly provide for the public health, morals, safety, convenience, and prosperity. Welch v. Swasey, 183 Mass. 264, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1160, 118 Am. St. Rep. 523, 79 N. E. 745; Com. v. Boston Adv. Co. 188 Mass. 348, 69 L.R.A. 817, 108 Am. St. Rep. 494, 74 N. E. 601; People ex rel. Kemp v. D'Oench, 111 N. Y. 359, 116 N. E. 862; Fruth v. Board of Affairs, 75 W. Va. 457, L.R.A.1915C, 981, 84 S. E. 105; Eubank v. Richmond, 226 U. S. 127, 57 L. ed. 156, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1123, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 76, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 192; District of Columbia v. Brooks, 214 U. S. 138, 53 L. ed. 941, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 500; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Illinois, 200 U. S.

Public safety from the danger of fire is the only ground upon which the city endeavors to justify and sustain its regulatory policy, and its position is well founded, if the regulation has any reasonable and substantial tendency to promote safety in that respect. The exercise of the police power must have a substantial basis. The power cannot be made a mere pretext for legislation that does not fall within it. Classification of property and rights for rate regulation, taxation, and the like cannot be made upon a mere arbitrary and groundless distinction between subjects. Coal & Coke R. Co. v. Conley, 67 W. Va. 129, 180, 67 S. E. 613; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. May, 194 U. S. 267, 48 L. ed. 971, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 638; Ozan Lumber Co. v. Union County Nat. Bank, 207 U. S. 251, 52 L. ed. 195, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 89. The same principle governs in the test of validity, applied to statutes and ordinances ostensibly passed and adopted for promotion of the public health, comfort, and convenience. Its effect and its professed object must substantially agree and coincide. Fulton v. Norteman, 60 W. Va. 562, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1196, 55 S. E. 658.

Artistic, civic, and economic views of a one-story building between three or four-story buildings in a section in which, as a rule, only the higher structures are put up, severely condemn it, but certain obvious laws of physics effectually exclude the assumption that it is substantially conducive to danger from fire. Of course, an open fire between tall buildings may be more dangerous, in the absence of resistance, than a smothered one; but a fire in a one-story building would not be an open one. It would be subject to the restraining influence of the roof and walls, in a manner similar to that exerted by the walls, floors, and roof of a higher structure. Besides, a low building is more accessible to firemen than a high one. The combustible matter on which the fire feeds is all near the ground and within easy reach. Water may be poured directly upon it from the windows and roofs of the adjacent and neighboring buildings. Its low altitude decreases the danger to firemen and facilitates their work. There is nothing by which the fire can spread directly upward, the direction in which it runs most rapidly, and the volume of combustible matter is smaller than that of a higher building. Any slight tendency of a one-story building situated between higher ones to danger by fire is manifestly outweighed and reduced to nothing by these obvious and commonly known factors and principles.

The power and authority over the relator's property, claimed by the city, if allowed by law, would be a serious restraint upon his right of use and enjoyment. It cannot be imposed for the benefit of adjacent or neighboring property owners. Eubank v. Richmond, 226 U. S. 137, 57 L. ed. 156, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1123, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 76, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 192, cited. Nor can it be imposed to effect symmetry of the city, street or section, otherwise than under the power of eminent domain, allowing compensation, if at all. Fruth v. Board of Affairs, 75 W. Va. 457, L.R.A. 1915C, 981, 34 S. E. 105, cited.

For the reasons stated, a peremptory writ of mandamus will be awarded agreeably to the prayer and motion therefor.

Annotation—Constitutionality of statute or ordinance limiting height of building.

This note is supplementary to that appended to Welch v. Swasey, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1160, on the above question.

Generally as to exercise of police power for esthetic purposes, see notes to People ex rel. Wineburgh Adv. Co. v. Murphy, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 735; Haller Sign Works v. Physical Culture Training School, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 998; and Byrne v. Maryland Realty Co. L.R.A. 1917A, 1220.

It will be noticed that the charter provision involved in STATE EX REL. SALE v. STAHLMAN, ante, 77, authorizing a municipality to regulate the height, construction, and inspection of buildings within its limits, was construed to confer authority respecting the height of buildings only to limit or restrict them L.R.A. 1918C.

for the safety of persons and property, and that it was held that a prevention of the erection of buildings in a city lower than those adjacent had no such tendency to prevent danger from fire or the spreading thereof as would justify or validate it under the police power.

The decision in Welch v. Swasey (1907) 193 Mass. 364, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1160, 118 Am. St. Rep. 523, 79 N. E. 745, was relied upon in Eubank v. Richmond (1910) 110 Va. 749, 67 S. E. 376, 19 Ann. Cas. 186, in upholding the validity of an act giving municipalities the power to prescribe building lines and regulate the height of buildings, and also of an ordinance providing that whenever the owners of two thirds of the property abutting on a street should request the committee on streets to establish a building line, the committee should establish a line not less than 5 nor more than 30 feet from the street line. This ordinance was held not to be a valid exercise of the police power, however, on an appeal to the United States Supreme Court (1912) 226 U. S. 137, 57 L. ed. 156, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1123, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 76, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 192, and the court there stated that it was unnecessary for them to consider the power of a city to regulate the height of buildings.

In Williams v. Boston (1906) 190 Mass. 541, 77 N. E. 509, and American Unitarian Assn. v. Com. (1907) 193 Mass. 470, 79 N. E. 878, in actions for damages, effect was given to statutes limiting the height of buildings in certain localities and providing for the recovery of certain damages by those whose property was injured thereby. The question of the constitutionality of the statutes was not, however, before the court for determination in these cases, although the court in the latter case intimated that such legislation, as an exercise of the police power, would be valid.

In Kilgour v. Gratto (1916) 224 Mass. 78, 112 N. E. 489, a statute giving cities and towns the right, among other things, to regulate the height of buildings, was before the court, but the question of its constitutionality was not raised, the point at issue being the validity of a by-law giving the selectmen of a town an uncontrolled discretion in allowing permits for the construction of factories. UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SECOND CIRCUIT.

MASSES PUBLISHING COMPANY

v.

THOMAS G. PATTON, Postmaster of the City of New York, Appt.

(246 Fed. 24.)

Postoffice — exclusion of nonmailable matter — constitutionality.

1. A statute excluding from the mails publications attempting to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty in the military or naval forces of the United States, does not infringe the constitutional guaranty of freedom of the press or of liberty and property.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, II. d, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — interference with discretion of Postmaster General.

2. The exercise of discretion by the Postmaster General in determining whether or not to transmit matter by mail which is alleged to be nonmailable under an act of Congress will not be interfered with by the courts unless clearly wrong.

For other cases, see Courts, I. c, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — exclusion from mails — non-mailable matter.

3. The Postmaster General does not abuse his discretion in excluding from the mails, under the statute making nonmailable any matter intended to cause refusal of duty in the military or naval forces of the United States, or to obstruct recruiting or enlistment in the service of the United States, a paper which idealizes those who resist the Conscription Law, commends as martyrs two persons convicted of conspiracy to induce persons not to register under the Conscription Act, encourages conscientious objection to such act, and by means of cartoons suggests disloyalty, represents government agents as trying to undermine democracy, and suggests that business interests brought on the war.

For other cases, see Postoffice, II. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — broken Liberty Bell.

4. A paper cannot be excluded from the mails merely because it contains a cartoon representing the Liberty Bell to be broken. For other cases, see Postoffice, II. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Evidence — burden of proof — exclusion from mails.

5. One seeking to enjoin the exclusion of his paper from the mails by order of the Postmaster General has the burden of showing that such officer exceeded his power, or exercised it wantonly or maliciously.

For other cases, see Evidence, II. i, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Postoffice — nonmailable matter — suggestion.

6. If the natural and reasonable effect of what is said in a paper is to encourage resistance to the Conscription Law, and the words are used in an endeavor to persuade to resistance, the paper may be excluded from the mail under the Espionage Act, although the duty to resist is not mentioned, or the interest in resistance of persons addressed is not suggested.

For other cases, see Postoffice, II. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, Hand, District Judge, granting a temporary injunction restraining him from treating a certain issue of plaintiff's magazine as non-mailable matter, and commanding him to transmit it through the mails. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Ward and Rogers, Circuit Judges, and Mayer, District Judge.

Mr. Francis G. Caffey for appellant.

Mr. Gilbert E. Roe for appellee.

Rogers, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainant seeks an injunction restraining the defendant, as postmaster of the city of New York, from treating the August issue of a magazine known as The Masses as nonmailable matter under the Act of Congress of June 15, 1917, commonly known as the "Espionage Act," and commanding him to transmit the said magazine through the mail in the usual way.

Upon the filing of the complaint an order was entered requiring the defendant to show cause why the injunction should not issue. At the hearing affidavits were presented on behalf of the complainant to show that, if the magazines should be excluded from the mails, the business of the complainant would be practically ruined. An affidavit of the Postmaster General of the United States was presented on behalf of the defendant.

Under the provisions of Espionage Act, title 12, it became the official duty of the Postmaster General to determine what matter is nonmailable, and that official had instructed the postmaster of New York that The Masses was nonmailable. It appears that before this order was issued the solicitor for the Department, the Attorney General of the United States, and the Judge Advocate General of the Army, the latter being a lawyer and charged with the administration of the Draft Act of May 18, 1917, were consulted, and that they each advised that the circulation of the issue in question would constitute an offense under the Espionage Act. And the Judge Advocate General informed the Department that it was his opinion that the necessary effect of the issue of this August number would be to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, and refusal of duty in the naval and military forces of the United States, and that it would obstruct the recruiting and enlistment service of the United States. The learned district judge, in a carefully prepared opinion, reached the conclusion that the August issue of the publication in question did not contain any illegal matter and that the injunction should issue.

That part of the Espionage Act which is involved here is title 12, which relates to the use of mails, and it reads as follows:

"Sec. 1. Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book or other publication, matter or thing, of any kind, in violation of any of the provisions of this act is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any postoffice or by any letter carrier: Provided, that nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize any person other than an employee of the Dead Letter Office, duly authorized thereto, or other person upon a search warrant authorized by law, to open any letter not addressed to himself.

"Sec. 2. Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book or other publication, matter or thing, of any kind, containing any matter advocating or urging treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to any law of the United States, is hereby declared to be nonmailable."

Section 3 of title 12 relates to the punishment to be imposed upon any person who uses or attempts to use the mails for the transmission of any matter declared to be nonmailable, and is not involved in this proceeding. But, as § 1 of title 12 makes nonmailable any matter which is in violation of any of the provisions of the act, it will be necessary to consider § 3 of title 1, which reads as follows: "Sec. 3. Whoever, when the United States is at war, shall wilfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States or to promote the success of its enemies and whoever, when the United States is at war, shall wilfully cause or attempt to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty, in the military or naval forces of the United States, or shall wilfully obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States, to the injury of the service or of the United States, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than twenty years, or both."

It is the clear intent of title 12 to close the United States mails to any letters or literature in furtherance of any acts prohibited under the other titles of the statute. It is said that the act violates the 1st Amendment to the Constitution, which declares that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press." It is also said that the act violates the 5th Amendment, which provided that "no person shall be . . . deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

In his Commentaries on the Laws of England Mr. Justice Blackstone, in speaking of the liberty of the press, declares that it is "essential to the nature of a free state." It consists, he says, "in laying no previous restraint upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published. Every free man has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public; . . . but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous, or illegal, he must take the consequence of his own temerity." Vol. 4, p. 151. And Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, states that "every free man has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public; to forbid this is to destroy the freedom of the press." Vol. 2, 4th ed. § 1884.

In Patterson v. Colorado, 205 U. S. 454, 462, 51 L. ed. 879, 881, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 558, 10 Ann. Cas. 689 (1907), the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Holmes, declares that the main purpose of the constitutional provision as to free press is "to prevent all such previous 'restraints' upon publications as had been practised by other governments," and they do "not prevent the subsequent punishment of such as may be deemed contrary to the public welfare." Now clearly the Espionage Act imposes no restraint prior to publication, and no restraint afterwards, except as it restricts circulation through the mails. Liberty of circulating may be essential to freedom of the press, but liberty of circulating through the mails is not, so long as its transportation in any other way as merchandise is not forbidden.

The act of Congress now called in question does not undertake to say that certain matter shall not be published nor that it shall not be transmitted in interstate commerce. It simply declares that such matter shall not be carried in the United States mails. In Ex parte Jackson, 96 U. S. 727, 24 L. ed. 877 (1877), the Supreme Court held that the power vested in Congress to establish postoffices and post roads embraces the regulation of the entire postal system of the country; and that, under it, Congress can designate what may be carried in the mail and what excluded. In that case Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, said: "In excluding various articles from the mail, the object of Congress has not been to interfere with the freedom of the press, or with any other rights of the people, but to refuse its facilities for the distribution of matter deemed injurious to the public morals."

was sustained. And that decision was adhered to in Re Rapiere, 143 U. S. 110, 134, 36 L. ed. 93, 102, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 374 (1892). In the latter case Mr. Chief Justice Fuller said: "The circulation of newspapers is not prohibited, but the government declines itself to become an agent in the circulation of printed matter which it regards as injurious to the people. The freedom of communication is not abridged within the intent and meaning of the constitutional provision unless Congress is absolutely destitute of any discretion as to what shall or shall not be carried in the mails, and compelled arbitrarily to assist in the dissemination of matters condemned by its judgment, through the governmental agencies which it controls. That power may be abused furnishes no ground for a denial of its existence, if government is to be maintained at all."

In Public Clearing House v. Coyne, 194 U. S. 497, 48 L. ed. 1092, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 789 (1904), the court had before it the constitutionality of a law which authorized the Postmaster General, "upon evidence satisfactory to him," and which did not provide for any trial, hearing, or inquiry of any kind, to shut out of the mails the letters of any person or company conducting a lottery or any other scheme or device for obtaining money or property of any kind through the mails by means of false or fraudulent pretenses. Mr. Justice Brown, writing for the court, said: "In establishing such [postal] system Congress may restrict its use to letters, and deny it to periodicals; . . . it may admit books to the mails and refuse to admit merchandise, or it may include all of these and fail to embrace within its regulations telegrams or large parcels of merchandise, although in most civilized countries of Europe these are also made a part of the postal service. It may also refuse to include in its mails such printed matter or merchandise as may seem objectionable to it upon the ground of public policy, as dangerous to its employees or injurious to other mail matter carried in the same packages. The postal regulations of this country, issued in pursuance of act of Congress, contain a long list of prohibited articles dangerous in their nature, or to other articles with which they may come in contact; such, for instance, as liquids, poisons, explosives, and inflammable articles, fatty substances, or live or dead animals, and substances which exhale a bad odor. It has never been supposed that the exclusion of these articles denied to their owners any of their constitutional rights. While it may be assumed, for the purpose of this case, that Congress would have no right to extend to one the benefit of its postal service, and deny it to another person in the same class and standing in the same relation to the government, it does not follow that under its power to classify mailable matter, applying different rates of postage to different articles, and prohibiting some altogether, it may not also classify the recipients of such matter, and forbid the delivery of letters to such persons or corporations as, in its judgment, are making use of the mails for the purpose of fraud or deception or the dissemination among its citizens of information of a character calculated to debauch the public morality. For more than thirty years not only has the transmission of obscene matter been prohibited, but it has been made a crime, punishable by fine or imprisonment, for a person to deposit such matter in the mails. The constitutionality of this law we believe has never been attacked. The same provision was by the same act extended to letters and circulars connected with lotteries and gift enterprises, the constitutionality of which was upheld by this court in Re Rapier, 143 U. S. 110, 36 L. ed. 93, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 374.

The court held that the fact that the Postmaster General could act and that no judicial hearing was provided for was not a fatal objection to the act. It declared: "That due process of law does not necessarily require the interference of the judicial power as laid down in many cases and by many eminent writers upon the subject of constitutional limitations. . . . If the ordinary daily transactions of the departments, which involve an interference with private rights, were required to be submitted to the courts before action was finally taken, the result would entail practically a suspension of some of the most important functions of the government."

The opinion of Judge Cooley in Weimer v. Bunbury, 30 Mich. 201, is cited approvingly, in which he said: "There is nothing in these words ('due process of law'), however, that necessarily implies that due process of law must be judicial process. Much of the process by means of which the government is carried on and the order of society maintained is purely executive or administrative. Temporary deprivations of liberty or property must often take place through the action of ministerial or executive officers or functionaries, or even of private parties, where it has never been supposed that the common law would afford redress."

This court holds, therefore, that the Espionage Act, in so far as it excludes from the mails certain matter declared to be unmailable, is constitutional.

The provisions contained in title 12 of the Espionage Act respecting the use of the L.R.A.1918C.

mails do not abridge the freedom of the press, nor deprive the complainant of its property, within the meaning of the 1st and 5th Amendments. Congress has not attempted to prevent the transportation of this publication as merchandise by the railways or by the express companies, and it has not authorized the confiscation of it, neither has it in any way prohibited publication.

In 1798 Congress enacted what is known as the Sedition Law, Act July 14, 1798, chap. 74, 1 Stat. at L. 596. It provided, among other things, for the punishment of any person who published any false and malicious thing against the government of the United States, or any matter intended to excite the people to oppose any law or act of the President in pursuance of law, or to resist or oppose or defeat any law. The act provoked great resentment throughout the country, and when it expired by its own limitation in 1801 it was not renewed. From that time until the present no similar legislation, so far as we are aware, has been enacted.

The Espionage Act now under consideration bears slight resemblance to the Sedition Law of 1798. The act as originally drafted provided that every publication "containing any matter of a seditious, anarchistic, or treasonable character" should be nonmailable. But when the act was under discussion in the Senate the words above quoted were stricken out; it having been objected that they were too indefinite and left too much room for construction. In Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, page 429, that distinguished authority says: "Repression of full and free discussion is dangerous in any government resting upon the will of the people. The people cannot fail to believe that they are deprived of rights, and will be certain to become discontented, when their discussion of public measures is sought to be circumscribed by the judgment of others upon their temperance or fairness. They must be left at liberty to speak with the freedom which the magnitude of the supposed wrongs appears in their minds to demand; and if they exceed all proper bounds of moderation, the consolation must be, that the evil likely to spring from the violent discussion will probably be less, and its correction by public sentiment more speedy, than if the terrors of the law were brought to bear to prevent the discussion."

In May's Constitutional History, chap. 10, p. 379, it is said that "when the press errs, it is by the press itself that its errors are left to be corrected. Repression has ceased to be the policy of rulers, and statesmen have at length fully realized the wise maxim of Lord Bacon, that 'the punishment of wits enhances their authority, and a forbidden writing is thought to be a certain spark of truth that flies up in the faces of them that seek to tread it out.' "

The policy of the government of the United States has conformed to the doctrine above laid down. But the fact that the policy of the government of the United States has been adverse to limiting freedom of discussion affords little assistance in construing the particular act now under consideration. In Hadden v. The Collector (Hadden v. Barney) 5 Wall. 107, 18 L. ed. 518 (1866), the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Field, declared that "what is termed the policy of the government with reference to any particular legislation is generally a very uncertain thing, upon which all sorts of opinions, each variant from the other, may be formed by different persons. It is a ground much too unstable upon which to rest the judgment of the court in the interpretation of statutes."

And in Dewey v. United States, 178 U. S. 510, 521, 44 L. ed. 1170, 1174, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 985, the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Harlan, declared that "this court has nothing to do with questions of mere policy that may be supposed to underlie the action of Congress. . . . Our province is to declare what the law is."

And in White v. United States, 191 U. S. 545, 551, 48 L. ed. 295, 297, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 172 (1903), Mr. Justice Day declared: "It is equally true that it is the business of courts to decide what the law is, and not by consideration or surmises as to the policy of the government have the effect to adjudge that to be law which has not been so enacted by the legislature."

Moreover, courts have nothing to do with the wisdom or unwisdom of a legislative act. It is the function of the legislative department to enact law, and of the judicial department to construe and apply it. The judges cannot pass upon the wisdom or the justice of the statute, but are simply to ascertain the intent of the lawmakers as expressed in the enactment, and to give effect thereto. United States v. First Nat. Bank, 234 U. S. 260, 58 L. ed. 1304, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 846. For reasons satisfactory to the lawmaking body the Espionage Act has been adopted, and, being valid, is the law of the land.

It is not intended by what has just been said to imply any doubt as to the wisdom of Congress in the enactment of the Espionage Act. The purpose of the act, as we understand it, was not to repress legitimate criticism of Congress or of the officers of the government, or to prevent any proper discussion looking to the repeal of any legislation which may have been enacted. The United States being at war in defense of American rights, Congress intended by this act to prevent any use being made of the mails for the dissemination and distribution of publications intended to embarrass and defeat the government in its effort to prosecute the war to a successful termination. The statute is one of great importance and under it the Postmaster General, whose duty it is to execute all laws relating to the postal service, had to determine whether the particular publication in question was mailable or unmailable matter as defined in the act.

The Espionage Act being constitutional, the question which arises, then, is whether the action of the Postmaster General in excluding The Masses from the mails warranted the district judge in issuing an injunction commanding him to allow it to be transmitted by mail. The Postmaster General is the head of the Postoffice Department. The obligations of his oath of office oblige him to see that the provisions of the Espionage Act are carried into effect, so far as they relate to the use of the mail, and that matter declared by the act to be non-mailable shall be excluded from the mails. The performance of that duty involves the exercise of his judgment and discretion. To what extent can the courts control him by injunction in the performance of this duty?

In Decatur v. Paulding, 14 Pet. 497, 599, 10 L. ed. 559, 609 (1840), a mandamus to compel the Secretary of the Navy to comply with a resolution passed by Congress granting a pension was refused. The Secretary, acting under the advice of the Attorney General, decided that Mrs. Decatur was not entitled to claim the pension under the resolution, as she had applied for and received her pension under the general law, and she could not have both. The opinion was by Chief Justice Taney, who said: "The duty required by the resolution was to be performed by him [the Secretary of the Navy] as the head of one of the executive departments of the government, in the ordinary discharge of his official duties. In general, such duties, whether imposed by act of Congress or by resolution, are not mere ministerial duties. The head of an executive department of the government, in the administration of the various and important concerns of his office, is continually required to exercise [his] judgment and discretion."

. . . The court could not entertain an appeal from the decision of one of the Secretaries, nor revise his judgment in any case where the law authorized him to exercise discretion or judgment. Nor can it, by mandamus, act directly upon the officer and guide and control his judgment or discretion in the matters committed to his care, in the ordinary discharge of his official duties."

In United States ex rel. Dunlap v. Black, 128 U. S. 40, 32 L. ed. 354, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 12 (1888), the court held that a mandamus to the Commissioner of Pensions was properly refused. The Commissioner had decided adversely an application for an increase of a pension under 21 Stat. at L. 281, chap. 236, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 8951. The opinion was by Mr. Justice Bradley, who said: "The court will not interfere by mandamus with the executive officers of the government in the exercise of their ordinary official duties, even where those duties require an interpretation of the law, the court having no appellate power for that purpose; but when they refuse to act in a case at all, or when, by special statute, or otherwise, a mere ministerial duty is imposed upon them, that is, as service which they are bound to perform without further question, then, if they refuse, a mandamus may be issued to compel them."

In American School v. McAnnulty, 187 U. S. 94, 47 L. ed. 90, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 33 (1902), the Supreme Court reversed the court below, which had dismissed a bill asking for an injunction to restrain a postmaster from carrying out an order of the Postmaster General withholding mail on the ground that the person to whom it was addressed was engaged in a scheme for obtaining money through the mails by means of fraudulent pretenses. The Supreme Court, in reversing the judgment, did so with instructions to issue the temporary injunction as applied for. The case was decided upon a demurrer, so that the allegations in the bill of complaint were taken as true, and the bill averred facts showing that the complainant's business was legitimate, and not fraudulent. If the business was not fraudulent, the Postmaster General had no authority under the act to withhold the mail.

In United States ex rel. Riverside Oil Co. v. Hitchcock, 190 U. S. 316, 47 L. ed. 1074, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 698 (1903), it was held that neither an injunction nor a mandamus would lie against an officer of the Land Department to control him in discharging an official duty which required the exercise of his judgment and discretion. Mr. Justice Peckham, writing for the court, said: "Whether he [the Secretary of the Interior] decided right or wrong is not the question. Having jurisdiction to decide at all, he had necessarily jurisdiction, and it was his duty, to decide as he thought the law was, and the courts have no power whatever under those circumstances to review his determination by mandamus or injunction. . . . The responsibility, as well as the power, rests with the Secretary, uncontrolled by the courts."

the bill asked for an injunction to compel the Postmaster General to transmit through the mails, as matter of the second class, a publication alleged to be a periodical, and to enjoin him from enforcing an order made by him, denying it entry as such. The bill was dismissed and the injunction denied. Mr. Justice Brown, writing for the court, said that "where Congress has committed to the head of a department certain duties requiring the exercise of judgment and discretion, his action thereon, whether it involve questions of law or fact, will not be reviewed by the courts, unless he has exceeded his authority or this court should be of opinion that his action was clearly wrong."

Again he says: "The rule upon this subject may be summarized as follows: That where the decision of questions of fact is committed by Congress to the judgment and discretion of the head of a department, his decision thereon is conclusive, and that even upon mixed questions of law and fact, or of law alone, his action will carry with it a strong presumption of its correctness, and the courts will not ordinarily review it, although they may have the power, and will occasionally exercise the right, of so doing."

And he concludes: "While, as already observed, the question [that decided by the Postmaster General] is one of doubt, we think the decision of the Postmaster General, who is vested by Congress with the power to exercise his judgment and discretion in the matter, should be accepted as final."

In Public Clearing House v. Coyne, 194 U. S. 497, 48 L. ed. 1092, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 798 (1904), the court held that it was within the power of Congress to intrust the Postmaster General with the power of seizing and detaining letters upon evidence satisfactory to himself, and that his action would not be reviewed by the court in doubtful cases. The act authorized the Postmaster General, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person was conducting a scheme or device for obtaining money or property through the mails by fraudulent pretenses, to instruct postmasters at any postoffice at which registered letters arrived, directed to any such person, to return the same to the postmaster at the office at which they were originally mailed with the word "Fraudulent" stamped upon the outside.

In Smith v. Hitchcock, 226 U. S. 53, 57 L. ed. 119, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6 (1912), a bill was filed to restrain the Postmaster General from revoking orders according second-class mail privileges to the plaintiffs. The ground of the bill was that the privileges had been annulled without granting the hearing required by the act (31 Stat. at L.

1099, 1107, chap. 851, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 7312) and that the publications were periodical publications within the meaning of the act (20 Stat. at L. 355, 358, 359, chap. 180). The Postmaster General had decided that the publication was not a "periodical" and could not be carried as second-class matter, but would have to go as third-class and pay the higher rate. Mr. Justice Holmes, speaking for the court, said: "Thus a question of law is raised, although, as suggested in Bates & G. Co. v. Payne, 194 U. S. 106, 108, 48 L. ed. 894, 895, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 595, we should not interfere with the decision of the Postmaster General, unless clearly of opinion that it was wrong. . . . We have no such clear opinion."

See also Lewis Pub. Co. v. Morgan, 229 U. S. 288, 57 L. ed. 1190, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 867; United States ex rel. Parish v. MacVeagh, 214 U. S. 124, 131, 53 L. ed. 936, 938, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 556; Johnson v. Drew, 171 U. S. 93, 43 L. ed. 88, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 800; Burfenning v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 163 U. S. 321, 323, 41 L. ed. 175, 176, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1018.

This, court holds, therefore, that if the Postmaster General has been authorized and directed by Congress not to transmit certain matter by mail, and is to determine whether a particular publication is nonmailable under the law, he is required to use judgment and discretion in so determining, and his decision must be regarded as conclusive by the courts, unless it appears that it is clearly wrong.

We come, therefore, to consider the authority vested by Congress in the Postmaster General to determine whether he acted within his jurisdiction when he excluded the complainant's magazine from the mails. The Espionage Act is entitled: "An Act to Punish Acts of Interference with the Foreign Relations, the Neutrality, and the Foreign Commerce of the United States, to Punish Espionage, and Better to Enforce the Criminal Laws of the United States, and for Other Purposes."

Title 12 of the act is the only one relating to the use of the mails. And § 1 of that title expressly declares that "every . . . publication . . . of any kind, in violation of any of the provisions of this act is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails."

As any publication which is in violation of any provision of the act is nonmailable, an examination of the act as a whole is necessary, and shows that the following matter is made nonmailable:

(1) Any matter advocating or urging treason or forcible resistance to any law of the United States. Title 12, § 3.

(2) Any matter containing information respecting the national defense and which is intended to be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of any foreign nation. Title 1, § 1.

(3) Any matter containing information, intended to be communicated to the enemy, with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, air craft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct of the war, or the plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any measures undertaken or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense which might be useful to the enemy. Title 1, § 2.

(4) Any matter, when the United States is at war, containing false statements wilfully intended to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States or to promote the success of its enemies, and matter wilfully intended to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty, in the military or naval forces of the United States, and matter wilfully intended to obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States. Title 1, § 3.

The excluded publication is a magazine known as The Masses. By its own statement it is a radical and revolutionary publication, not revolutionary, however, in that it desires to overturn existing forms of government by force of arms, as it is opposed to war. It is revolutionary, not only in matters political, but in art and literature and religion as well. It is a monthly publication of about 50 pages, and has a circulation of from 20,000 to 25,000 copies each month. For a number of years it has passed freely through the mails to its subscribers throughout the United States.

The objectionable matter was contained in the August issue and consisted of certain articles. These were entitled: "A Question," "A Tribute," "Conscientious Objectors," "Friends of American Freedom." Besides these articles, there were four cartoons, which were also objected to. These were entitled: "Liberty Bell," "Conscription," "Making the World Safe for Capitalism," and "Congress and Big Business."

In the article entitled "A Question," the editor writes: "I would like to know to-day how many men and women there are in America who admire the self-reliance and sacrifice of those who are resisting the conscription law on the ground that they believe it violates the sacred rights and liberties of man. How many of the American population are in accord with the American press when it speaks of the arrest of these men of genuine courage as a 'Round-up of Slackers?' Are there none to whom this picture of the American Republic adopting toward its citizens the attitude of a rider toward cattle is appalling? I recall the Essays of Emerson, the poems of Walt Whitman, which sounded a call never heard before in the world's literature, for erect and inexpressible individuality, the courage of solitary faith and heroic assertion of self. It was America's contribution to the ideals of man. . . . I wonder if the number is few to whom this high resolve was the distinction of our American idealism, and who feel inclined to bow their heads to those who are going to jail under the whip of the state, because they will not do what they do not believe in doing. Perhaps there are enough of us, if we make ourselves heard in voice and letter, to modify this ritual of contempt in the daily press, and induce the American government to undertake the imprisonment of heroic young men with a certain sorrowful dignity that will be new in the world."

The article idealizes those who resist the Conscription Law, and it represents them as heroic. In saying that the law violates sacred rights and is contrary to liberty, and that those who refuse to submit to it are heroes, it incites disobedience to the statute.

The poem entitled "A Tribute" represents as martyrs worthy of admiration two notorious persons who had just been convicted under an indictment charging them with conspiracy to induce persons not to register under the Conscription Act. It reads in part as follows:

Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman
Are in prison to-night.
But they have made themselves elemental forces.

Like the water that climbs down the rocks,
Like the wind in the leaves,
Like the gentle night that holds us.
They are working on our destinies,
They are forging the love of the nations.

The statement that these two individuals have made themselves elemental forces akin to the rocks and trees and rivers, under ordinary circumstances, would be harmless; but coming at this particular time, and after their conviction, the inference being that their greatness grows out of their offense, and that they are worthy of admiration and honor, it is equivalent to saying that their unlawful conduct is worthy to be followed.

The article "Conscientious Objectors" refers to a number of letters written from English prisons by conscientious objectors. These letters are printed in the same issue of the magazine, and the article recommends L.R.A.1918C.

those in this country who intend "to stick it out to the end" (resist conscription to the end) to read thoroughly the letters. The article declares: "We believe that our protesters against government tyranny will be as steadfast as their English comrades. It is not by any means as certain that they will be as polite to their guards and tormentors, but we hope they will remember that these are acting under official compulsion, and not as free men. . . . There are some laws which the individual feels that he cannot obey, and which he will suffer any punishment, even that of death, rather than recognize as having authority over him. The fundamental stubbornness of the free soul, against which all the powers of the state are helpless, constitutes a conscientious objection, whatever its original sources may be in political or social opinion. It remains to be demonstrated that a political disapproval of this war can express itself in the same heroic firmness that has in England upheld the Christian objectors to war as murder." The article, taken as a whole, may well be regarded as intended to encourage objectors to be as steadfast protesters against "government tyranny" as their English comrades. In other words, it is an encouragement to disobey the law.

The article "Friends of American Freedom" is devoted to Alexander Berkman and Emma Goldman, already commented upon in this opinion as having been convicted of a conspiracy to induce persons not to register. The article pays them "tribute of admiration for their courage and devotion." There is an allusion to the fact that Berkman and Goldman had advocated in their paper, Mother Earth, that those liable to the military draft, who do not believe in the war, should refuse to register. The natural effect of it is to encourage those who have objections to war not to register as the Conscription Act requires. Admiration of conspirators convicted of the offense of seeking to defeat the operation of the Conscription Act is equivalent to an approval of their crime and an encouragement to others to disobey the law in like manner.

In considering the cartoons, we may observe that political cartoons have long been used as a very effective means of political propaganda. They were so employed in France during the French Revolution and in England as early as the days of Walpole. In this country they were used during the Revolution, in the War of 1812, and in the Civil War. The brilliant cartoons of Nast, satirizing the Tweed ring in the city of New York, were conceded at the time to have exerted a powerful influence in the destruction of that corrupt combination. A cartoon may be a leading article. It has been described as "a leading article transformed into a picture." It can express ideas as lucidly and clearly as printed words, and there is no escape from legal responsibility because pictures, rather than words, are used.

In the cartoon entitled "Liberty Bell," the Liberty Bell is presented in a broken form. The idea meant to be conveyed may be that there is no such thing as liberty left in the United States. But whatever it means, taken by itself, it would afford no ground for exclusion from the mails.

The cartoon entitled "Conscription" portrays a youth lying across the mouth of a cannon with his arms chained to the wheels of the gun carriage. "Democracy," in the form of a nude woman, is tied by her extended arms and her crossed feet to a wheel. And "Labor," crouched down on the gun carriage, a pitiable object, is fastened in like manner. A woman is on her knees on the earth at the side of the cannon in utter despair, with her head bent back and her arms uplifted, while a child lies neglected at her side. The counsel for the complainant admits in his brief that this cartoon "is a powerful argument against the Conscription Law. It says, in effect, that the youth of the land are by it forced into military service; that the law binds labor to military service as well; that it causes great agony and suffering to the womanhood of the country, and that the mothers of the country with children too small to be subject to the 'Draft' pray to God that the Draft Law may be repealed before their children come to military age, and that democracy is trampled under foot by such a law. That is what this picture says."

But that is not what it says to us. It seems to us to say: This law murders youth, enslaves labor to its misery, drives womanhood into utter despair and agony, and takes away from democracy its freedom. Its voice is not the voice of patriotism, and its language suggests disloyalty. If counsel wished the court to understand that, in his opinion, the effect of the cartoon would not be to interfere with enlistment, we are not able to agree with him. That it would interfere, and was intended to interfere, was evidently the opinion of the Postmaster General; and this court cannot say that he was not justified in his conclusion.

The cartoon "Making the World Safe for Capitalism" shows a Russian absorbed in studying a paper marked "Plans for a Genuine Democracy." On one side of him Japan and England appear in a threatening attitude, and on the other Mr. Root and Mr. Russell, members of the commission sent by the United States to Russia, appear in the guise of advisers. Mr. Root has in his hands a noose, labeled "Advice," with which it is intended to entrap or choke to death the Russian democracy. The court cannot say that the Postmaster General was not warranted in concluding that this cartoon was intended to arouse the resentment of some of our citizens of foreign birth and prevent their enlistment.

In the cartoon "Congress and Big Business" Congress is represented by a disconsolate individual who is ignored by a number of overdeveloped men of Big Business gathered around a table inspecting a large paper spread over it and labeled "War Plans." Congress is quoted as saying: "Excuse me, gentlemen, where do I come in?" "Big Business" replies: "Run along now; we got through with you when you declared war for us." This cartoon is intended to stir up class hatred of the war and to arouse an unwillingness to serve in the military and naval forces of the United States. The clear import is, if the war was brought on by "Big Business," then let "Big Business" carry it on, and let Labor stand aloof. The court cannot say that the Postmaster General was clearly wrong in concluding that it would interfere with enlistments.

In the case at bar, giving to the complainant the most favorable construction, the burden is upon it to overcome the presumption that the Postmaster General's conclusion is right, or that he has exceeded his power or exercised it wantonly or maliciously. See Judge Mayer's opinion in Sanden v. Morgan (1915; D. C.) 225 Fed. 266, 269. This the complainant should do by a preponderance of evidence. And this the complainant has not done.

It may be conceded that the language of the statute cannot have one meaning in an indictment and another when the question arises respecting the exclusion of matter from the mail as containing that which violates the provisions of § 3 of title 1. If the magazine is nonmailable under that section, it may be that the editor has committed a crime in publishing it, for which, upon conviction, he may be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned for not more than twenty years, or both. The district judge thought no crime had been committed, and that the magazine was therefore mailable, because the publication did not in so many words directly advise or counsel a violation of the act. He declared that "if one stops short of urging upon others that it is their duty or their interest to resist the law, it seems to me one should not be held to have attempted to cause its violation. If that be not the test, I can see no escape from the conclusion that under this section every political agitation which can be shown to be apt to create a seditious temper is illegal. I am confident that, by such language, Congress had no such revolutionary purpose in view." [244 Fed. 540.]

This court does not agree that such is the law. If the natural and reasonable effect of what is said is to encourage resistance to a law, and the words are used in an endeavor to persuade to resistance, it is immaterial that the duty to resist is not mentioned, or the interest of the persons addressed in resistance is not suggested. That one may wilfully obstruct the enlistment service, without advising in direct language against enlistments, and without stating that to refrain from enlistment is a duty or in one's interest, seems to us too plain for controversy. To obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service, within the meaning of the statute, it is not necessary that there should be a physical obstruction. Anything which impedes, hinders, retards, restrains, or puts an obstacle in the way of recruiting, is sufficient. In granting the stay of the injunction until this case could be heard in this court upon the appeal, Judge Hough declared that "it is at least arguable whether there can be any more direct incitement to action than to hold up to admiration those who do act. Oratio obliqua has always been preferred by rhetoricians to oratio recta; the Beatitudes have for some centuries been considered highly hortatory, though they do not contain the injunction, 'Go thou and do likewise.'" [— C. C. A. —, 245 Fed. 106.]

With this statement we fully agree. Moreover, it is not necessary that an incitement to crime must be direct. At common law the "counseling" which constituted one an accessory before the fact might be indirect. See Whart. Crim. Law, 11th ed. § 266. Bishop lays down the rule thus: Every man is responsible criminally "for what of wrong flows directly from his corrupt intentions. . . . If he awoke into action an indiscriminate power, he is responsible. If he gave directions vaguely and incautiously, and the person receiving them acted according to what he might have foreseen would be the understanding, he is responsible." 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 641.

And in Reg. v. Sharpe, 3 Cox, C. C. 288, it is laid down that "he who inflames people's minds and induces them by violent means to accomplish an illegal object is himself a rioter, though he take no part in the riot."

In conclusion, we are satisfied that the publication involved contains no matter advocating or urging treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to any law of the United States, in violation of § 2 of title 12. The Postmaster General's exclusion of the publication from the mails is not put on the ground that it contained any such matter. It is not so clear that the publication is free from matter which involves an attempt to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty in the military or naval forces of the United States. The Postmaster General thought it contained matter objectionable on that ground, and a difference of opinion upon that phase of the matter is possible.

The question whether the publication contained matter intended wilfully to obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service is less doubtful. Indeed, the court does not hesitate to say that, considering the natural and reasonable effect of the publication, it was intended wilfully to obstruct recruiting; and even though we were not convinced that any such intent existed, and were in doubt concerning it, the case would be governed by the principle that the head of a Department of the government in a doubtful case will not be overruled by the courts in a matter which involves his judgment and discretion, and which is within his jurisdiction.

The order granting the preliminary injunction is reversed.

Ward, Circuit Judge, concurring:

I think the sole ground on which the order of the Postmaster General can be sustained is that some parts of the August number of The Masses were intended to obstruct and do obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States. This involves a conclusion of fact to be drawn by him from the cartoons and text of this particular number. Advice to resist the law may be indirect as well as direct, and the conclusion of the Postmaster General in matters of fact, whether we agree with him or not, is final. I think it important, however, to say that not every writing, the indirect effect of which is to discourage recruiting or enlistment, is within the statute. In addition to the natural effect of the language on the reader, the intention to discourage is essential. Arguments in favor of immediate peace, or in favor of repealing the Conscription Act, do this indirectly. It is, notwithstanding, the constitutional right of every citizen to express such opinions, both orally and in writing, and Congress cannot be presumed to have intended by the Espionage Act to authorize the Postmaster General to exclude such articles, written honestly and without the intention of advising resistance to the law. His authority in the premises depends exclusively upon the statute, as was well stated by Mr. Justice Peckham in American School v. McAnnulty, 187 U. S. 109, 47 L. ed. 96, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 39: "Here it is contended that the Postmaster General has, in a case not covered by the acts of Congress, excluded from the mails letters addressed to the complainants. His right to exclude letters, or to refuse to permit their delivery to persons addressed, must depend upon some law of Congress, and, if no such law exist, then he cannot exclude or refuse to deliver them. Conceding, arguendo, that when a question of fact arises, which, if found in one way, would show a violation of the statutes in question in some particular, the decision of the Postmaster General that such violation had occurred, based upon some evidence to that effect, would be conclusive and final, and not the subject of review by any court, yet to that assumption must be added the statement that if the evidence before the Postmaster General, in any view of the facts, failed to show a violation of any Federal law, the determination of that official that such violation existed would not be the determination of a question of fact, but a pure mistake of law on his part, because the facts being conceded, whether they amounted to a violation of the statutes would be a legal question, and not a question of fact."

Annotation—Exclusion of seditious matter from the mails under the Espionage Act.

As may be seen from the opinion in MASSSES PUB. CO. v. PATTON, ante, 79, the court below took the view that the publications complained of did not violate the statute. (1917) 244 Fed. 535. Pending the appeal a stay was granted by a judge of the appellate court. (1917) — C. C. A. —, 245 Fed. 102.

In commenting on MASSSES PUB. CO. v. PATTON, the Central L. J. vol. 86, p. 132, says, not without pertinence: "It would seem quite a claim for one having views that might be deemed opposed to the policy of our government in the prosecution of the war to claim that the government must aid him in their dissemination."

In Jeffersonian Pub. Co. v. West (1917) 245 Fed. 585, the court refused to enjoin the postmaster at Thomson, Georgia (acting on the order of the Postmaster General), from withdrawing the second-class mailing privileges of The Jeffersonian, a newspaper. The court agreed with the Postmaster General that the matter printed in the publication was unmailable, as evincing a purpose on the part of the publisher to make false statements with intent to interfere with "the operation and success of the military or naval forces of the United States, to wilfully obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States, to the injury of the service," etc. Among the matters objected to were the following statements: "Men conscripted to go to Europe are virtually condemned to death and everybody knows it. President Wilson admitted as much in his Flag Day address. . . . Why is your boy condemned to die in Europe? . . . Woodrow Wilson did swear to support the Constitution. And now, within six months after taking that solemn and public oath, the Congressmen and President, who did so, are treating the Constitution exactly as the Kaiser treated the Belgium treaty. . . . These are the Representatives in Congress, Lower House, who confiscated the liberty and the lives of your sons. . . . I advise . . . the conscripts to await the decision of the United States Supreme Court, and not to be clubbed by the fact of conscription into enlistment. Once you volunteer and sign up, you can be sent anywhere, and the law can't help you."

It may be noted that in United States v. Pierce (1917) 245 Fed. 878, the court overruled a demurrer to an indictment under the Criminal Code and the Espionage Act for conspiracy in publishing a pamphlet or circular. After quoting at length therefrom, the court characterizes some of the quotations as follows: "We have here, not only lurid and exaggerated pictures of the horrors of war, possible and impossible, but many false statements calculated to incite opposition to the war and opposition to the government, and also calculated to interfere with the morale of our armies, discourage enlistments, registration, and willing service in our armies, and encourage desertion. These false statements are also calculated to encourage our enemies and discourage and intimidate our own citizens and soldiers, and thereby promote the success of our enemies. It is not true that the recruiting officers will take our sons of military age and 'impress them into the army.' It is not true that 'you are being dragged, whipped, lashed, hurled into it' (the Army or the war). It is not true that 'the Attorney General of the United States is so busy sending to prison men who do not stand up when the Star Spangled Banner is played that he has no time to protect the food supply from gamblers.' The Attorney General of the United States is not doing anything of the kind. It is not true that 'we are beholding the spectacle of whole nations working as one person for the accomplishment of a single end, namely, killing.' It is not true that 'now you call every person traitor, slacker, pro-enemy who will not go crazy on the subject of killing; and you have turned the whole energy of all the nations of the world into the service of their kings for the purpose of killing, killing, killing.' It is not true that 'our entry into it (this war) was determined by the certainty that if the allies do not win, J. P. Morgan's loan to the allies will be repudiated and those American investors who bit on his promises would be hooked.' Here is a plain assertion to every intelligent mind that the declaration of war to which reference has been made contains a falsehood, and that such declaration was made because of the fear that the allies might not win, and that in such case J. P. Morgan's loans to the allies would be repudiated, payment refused, and the American investors would lose their loans and suffer loss. In other words, that our entry into this war with Germany was determined upon by Congress to insure, if possible, the success of the allies, to the end that they would fulfil their contracts and pay the loans made them by individuals in the United States. The purposes and motives of our President and of Congress are impugned and grossly misrepresented and falsified. What reports or statements can be more or better calculated to interfere with the operation and success of our military and naval forces in this war, or more or better calculated to promote the success of the enemies of the United States?"

It is not ultra vires for a railroad corporation to assist and join in a collateral enterprise which is incidental thereto, which helps build up and develop its property, when the same is not too remote from its corporate aims and objects, and the public is not prejudiced thereby.

Smith, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

In July, 1900, there was organized under the laws of Illinois the defendant the C. B. Live Stock Company, with its principal place of business at Chicago, Illinois. It originally had a capital stock of $100,000, divided into shares of $100 each, held as follows:

Julian M. Bassett	..... 200 shares	$20,000
L. A. Coonley, ward	.... 150 shares	15,000
Howard Coonley	..... 75 shares	7,500
Avery Coonley	..... 200 shares	20,000
Edward P. Bailey	.... 100 shares	10,000
John Stuart Coonley	... 200 shares	20,000
Sarah Coonley	..... 75 shares	7,500

This company had acquired by 1912 about 87,000 acres of land in Crosby county, Texas. In the meantime railroads had been built through the region, but none striking the lands of the defendant the C. B. Live Stock Company. It was about 40 miles to the nearest point on the railroad. Then the owners of the C. B. Live Stock Company decided to build a railroad. An Illinois corporation, and least of all one organized to engage in the live stock business, could not build a railroad in Texas, and it was decided to organize a new corporation for that purpose. It was necessary for a majority of the directors of the railroad company to reside in Texas, and for the reasons stated and to get more capital five or six new stockholders were taken into the new company, not in the old. On March 28, 1910, the articles of incorporation of the Crosbyton-Southplains Railroad Company were acknowledged, and on April 2, 1910, the majority of the board of directors made affidavit that the capital stock had been subscribed to an amount in excess of $1,000 per mile of the proposed railroad and 5 per cent thereof had been paid in cash. On April 6, 1910, the attorney general certified that the articles were in accordance with the provisions of chapter 1, title 94, of the Revised Statutes of Texas, and not in conflict with the laws of the United States or the state of Texas. On the same day the articles were filed for record with the secretary of state and recorded. On May 10, 1911, the first train was operated over the road, which extended from Spur, in Dickens county, across Crosby county, to Lubbock, in Lubbock county, and it has been continuously operated ever since. On May 9, 1912, the C. B. Live Stock Company entered into a contract with the Realty Realization Company of Chicago, Illinois, by which the former put all its lands in the hands of the latter company for sale, agreeing to pay $5 per acre for the expense of sale, and 30 per cent of the purchase money above a stipulated net price as a commission for making the sale. The Crosbyton-Southplains Town Site Company and the Realty Realization Company entered into a contract, adopting the contract between the C. B. Live Stock Company and the Realty Company, save a change as to the amount of the commission on the sale of town lots. On the same day, but whether before or after the two contracts just referred to, does not appear, and perhaps that is immaterial, at a special meeting of the board of directors of the Crosbyton-Southplains Railroad Company: "The chairman stated to the board that, on account of the vast unsettled country through which the road is operating and will operate if extended, it had become necessary to establish an emigration department in order to get into communication with settlers, emigration companies, agents, and land-owners, and to assist in advertising and settling farmers and others in Crosby and adjoining counties. He stated that, as the company had for its object the transportation of freight and passengers, it was incumbent upon the board to do all in its power to help create this business in every legitimate manner, and that he believed that an emigration department would greatly increase traffic of all kinds of the railroad, by aiding in settling the country and creating a publicity department, such as is usual with the present-day railroad. Whereupon, on motion duly made and seconded, the board did unanimously create and establish, for this company and for the purposes mentioned by the chairman, an emigration department, and appointed Clinton S. Woolfolk general emigration agent, and did authorize the vice president-general manager to pay said general emigration agent whatever salary deemed necessary by said vice president-general manager; said general emigration agent to work under the authority of the vice president-general manager, with power to appoint special emigration agents, under the advice and with the consent of the vice president-general manager."

The salary of Clinton S. Woolfolk as "general emigration agent" was subsequently fixed at $1 a month and an annual pass on the railroad. Numerous persons were appointed special emigration agents, as provided for in the action of the board of directors. Among these was George W. Butler, W. J. Brunson, F. W. Wilsey, and probably Fred H. Johns. Their salary was also fixed at $1 a month and a pass over the road. On August 24, 1912, a contract was entered into, signed by the "Land and Colonization Department, Crosbyton-Southplains Railroad Company, by George W. Butler, Land Commissioner," and the plaintiff, Della Thraillkill. This contract recited that the railroad controlled the sale of certain lands in Crosby and Dickens counties, Texas, and desired to secure the services of Mrs. Thraillkill in the sale and disposition of the same, and appointed and designated her as agent at Clarinda, Iowa, for the sale of said lands. "The party of the first part [the Railroad Company] agrees to pay to the party of the second part [Mrs. Thraillkill] as compensation for services in the premises a commission equaling $3 per acre up to $40 per acre and 7½ per cent on land above $40 of the purchase price at which any lands are sold by or through the efforts of such second party at prices and terms acceptable to said first party."

There is no evidence that this contract was ever terminated, but on August 24, 1913, a new and similar contract was executed in the name of the Orchards Heights Development Company, the Crosbyton-Southplains Railroad Company, by Fred H. Johns, manager, and by Mrs. Thraillkill. The plaintiff went ahead and sold considerable quantities of the lands of the C. B. Live Stock Company under these contracts, and brought suit against it and the Railroad Company to recover for the stipulated commissions. The case was tried to a jury, and at the conclusion of all the evidence the court said: "In the cause on trial . . . there has been submitted to the court in the course of the evening a motion to direct this jury to return a verdict for the defendants, and that has been fully argued by counsel on both sides, and on the submission of the motion I have deemed it my duty to instruct you to return a verdict for both defendants in this case for two reasons, along with other reasons: First, that the Railroad Company—that as to any contract or obligation of the Railroad Company—made to take care of commission of agents working for the Realization Company, that the Railroad Company has no power to make such a contract, being a public service corporation, the rates being fixed by the law, by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It has no money except what people pay for transporting goods over the railroad. It has only power to use money for legitimate railroad purposes, and not for speculation of this kind, and any contract made would be absolutely void, if a contract was made. As to the Cattle Company, I should say that the evidence here is that the Realization Company did sell this land for them, and that she, the plaintiff, was working for the Realization Company, and of course the Live Stock Company would not be held to pay the agents—the men employed to sell the land under a contract by which that agent, the Realization Company, agreed it would pay all the expense itself, any more than if [you] hired a man to sell your farm for you, and agreed to pay him $200, and he went out and hired another man, and agreed to give him $50; you would not be bound to pay the $50 and also the $200. So for those two reasons the motion is sustained. You are directed to return a verdict for the defendants, and you may sign this."

To this instruction the plaintiff excepted, and, after judgment rendered upon a verdict returned in accordance with the instruction, the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

Let us first see if the ruling of the district court is correct as to the C. B. Live Stock Company. There is no claim there is any express contract between plaintiff and it. Reliance is had as against that corporation upon the right to recover under a quantum meruit. When, as in this case, the C. B. Live Stock Company had a contract with the Realty Realization Company to sell its lands, and there is nothing to indicate that it knew that the plaintiff was selling the lands in its own behalf, or not as a subagent of the Realty Realization Company, there is nothing upon which an implied contract of the C. B. Live Stock Company to pay her can rest. The court was right in directing a verdict for the C. B. Live Stock Company. Very different is the situation with reference to the Crosbyton-Southplains Railroad Company.

With that corporation the plaintiff had what appeared to be an express written contract to pay her $3 per acre commission upon all lands controlled by them sold by her. Two questions naturally arise: First, did the agent who signed her contract have authority to do so? Second, was said contract ultra vires?

The first contract in the name of the Railroad Company was signed, "The Land and Colonization Department, Crosbyton-Southplains Railroad Company, by George W. Butler, Land Commissioner." This was manifestly signed by the Railroad Company, by Butler, and, if he had authority to make the contract, the mere fact that he signed it "Land Commissioner," in place of "Special Emigration Agent," would not defeat a recovery. It is evident that the contract was signed by the company by Butler, and if Butler had authority to sign the contract for the corporation it could make no difference if he signed it "Land Commissioner," in place of "Special Emigration Agent."

of the board of directors told the board that on account of the vast unsettled country through which the railroad was operating it became necessary to establish an emigration department in order to get into communication with settlers, emigration companies, agents, and landowners, and to assist in advertising and settling farmers and others in Crosby and adjoining counties. It was accordingly unanimously resolved to establish for the purposes mentioned by the chairman an emigration department, and Clinton S. Woolfolk was appointed general emigration agent, with power to appoint special emigration agents upon the advice and with the approval of the vice president-general manager. Under the resolution Butler was appointed special emigration agent, and as such, under the title of "Land Commissioner," he signed the contract. The words "Land Commissioner" are descriptio persone, and the contract, if signed in the name of the Crosbyton-Southplains Railroad Company, by George W. Butler, without more, would be sufficient, if it appeared that George W. Butler was an agent of the Crosbyton-Southplains Railroad Company, authorized to make the contract. The creation of the emigration department, to get into communication with settlers and to assist in settling farmers and others in Crosby and adjoining counties, and the appointment of Mr. Butler as special emigration agent, apparently vested in him the authority to make the contract in question.

We come now to the question as to whether said contract was ultra vires. There is no express prohibition of such a contract by a railroad company in the laws of Texas. It is customary for railroad companies, for the purpose of developing freight and passenger business, to maintain immigration departments. No authority has been called to our attention which prohibits such departments or the paying of reasonable compensation for securing settlers. The doctrine of ultra vires, whether invoked for or against a corporation, is not favored in the law. San Antonio v. Mehaffy, 96 U. S. 312, 315, 24 L. ed. 816, 817; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. McCarthy, 96 U. S. 258, 267, 24 L. ed. 693, 695; St. Arvit v. Kettle River Co. 133 C. C. A. 76, 216 Fed. 872.

Could the Railroad Company lawfully contract to pay commissions upon the sale of lands which it did not own, but along its route, by individuals to other individuals, the Railroad Company being neither vendor nor vendee?

It seems to us that this is a question as to whether the Railroad Company has a right to advertise the lands along its route to bring settlers; and, if it can, why can it not pay a reasonable sum to someone to secure purchasers rather than to expend a large sum in advertising in the hope of securing purchasers? The question must ordinarily be resolved into one of whether the contract is fair and reasonable. In Heinz v. National Bank, 150 C. C. A. 592, 237 Fed. 942, this court said: "It is elementary that the corporate powers of a national bank, as well as of other corporations, are of two classes: (1) Those expressly granted; and (2) those impliedly granted, as reasonably incident and necessary to the carrying out of the powers expressly granted. The former have to do largely with the main business objects and purpose of the corporation; the latter largely with the means and methods of attaining those objects and carrying out those purposes. The former are determined once and for all by the language of the charter or the fundamental law; the latter may change according to time, place, and surrounding circumstances. The test of the former is whether they are found in the words of the charter or law; the test of the latter is whether they are fairly incident to the former, and reasonably necessary to carrying them out. In determining whether a given act is within the former, the judgment and actions of the directors and stockholders have no legal weight or bearing. In determining whether a given act is within the latter, the judgment of the directors and stockholders, while not conclusive, is entitled to consideration. Morse, Banks & Bkg. § 54; 1 Machen, Corp. §§ 68, 87-90; Thomp. Corp. 2d ed. §§ 2100-2129. In Burnes v. Burnes, 70 C. C. A. 357, 137 Fed. 781, this court said, speaking of the implied powers of a private corporation: 'While the powers of a corporation are limited to those expressly granted and those fairly incidental thereto, they include the latter as completely as the former, and they always include the indispensable and the suitable means to exercise the granted powers.' In Colorado Springs Co. v. American Pub. Co. 38 C. C. A. 433, 97 Fed. 843, this court said, in speaking of the same subject: 'To sustain an act done by a private corporation as a valid exercise of corporate power, it is only necessary, where the act is not challenged by the state, to show that the act in question was not prohibited by the company's charter, and that it had a natural and reasonable tendency to aid in the accomplishment of one or more of the objects for which the corporation was created.' That the word 'necessary,' when used in ref. L.R.A.1918C.

erence to implied powers, does not mean indispensable, and is not to be given a narrow, restricted meaning, it is only necessary to refer to McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 413, 414, 4 L. ed. 579, 603."

In Jacksonville, M. P. R. & Nav. Co. v. Hooper, 160 U. S. 514, 40 L. ed. 515, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379, the court quotes with approval the language of Lord Chancellor Selborne in Atty. Gen. v. Great Eastern R. Co. L. R. 5 App. Cas. 473, 478: "This doctrine ought to be reasonably, and not unreasonably, understood and applied, and that whatever may fairly be regarded as incidental to, or consequential upon, those things which the legislature has authorized, ought not, unless expressly prohibited, to be held, by judicial construction, to be ultra vires."

In Union P. R. Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 163 U. S. 564, 581, 41 L. ed. 265, 271, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1180, the court said: "But where the subject-matter of the contract is not foreign to the purposes for which the corporation is created, a contract embracing 'whatever may fairly be regarded as incidental to, or consequential upon, those things which the legislature has authorized, ought not, unless expressly prohibited, to be held by judicial construction to be ultra vires.'"

A railroad company may enter into contracts not expressly nominated in its charter, if they are reasonably incidental to its objects or subsidiary to its chief purposes. Whatever transactions are fairly incidental or auxiliary to the main business of the corporation and necessary or expedient in the protection, care, and management of its property, may be undertaken by the corporation and be within the scope of its corporate powers. Teele v. Rockport Granite Co. 224 Mass. 20, 112 N. E. 497.

The Railroad Company ran for many miles through the lands of the C. R. Live Stock Company. It could obtain no business, freight or passenger, through that territory, except as it derived it directly or indirectly from the Live Stock Company. It was deeply interested from every financial point in having these lands divided up. The commissions agreed to be paid were, as shown by the evidence, very low for that region. We are of the opinion that, to secure the dividing up of these lands, one of the incidental powers of the Railroad Company was to agree to pay reasonable commissions for the sale of these lands, and the contract made in the name of the company by Butler was not ultra vires.

It is true the district court treated this as a contract to take care of commissions of agents working for the Realty Realization Company. This contract did not so provide.

There is no evidence that the plaintiff was in these matters the agent of the Realty Realization Company.

Our conclusion is that the judgment must be affirmed as to the C. B. Live Stock Company and reversed as to the Crosbyton-Southplains Railroad Company, with directions to set aside the verdict as to that corporation and grant a new trial.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

JOHN F. CRANEY

v.

JOHN DONOVAN.

(— Conn. —, 102 Atl. 640.)

Libel — charging adultery.

1. Charging adultery is actionable per se. For other cases, see Libel and Slander, II. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Evidence — speaking defamatory words — sufficiency to support recovery.

2. The speaking of defamatory words raises the presumption of falsity and absence of legal excuse and will justify recovery in the absence of proof of truth or privilege.

For other cases, see Evidence, II. e, 8, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Damages — publication of libel — exemplary.

3. Exemplary damages may be awarded for the publication of a libel with actual malice.

For other cases, see Damages, II. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — compensation for slander.

4. The damages for slander include compensation for all injuries done to the reputation and feelings of the person slandered and for all mental sufferings which are the proximate results of the defamation.

For other cases, see Damages, III. o, 2, a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Note. — The majority opinion in CRANEY v. DONOVAN is a very clear and enlightening exposition of the relation of actual malice to the subject of damages, particularly compensatory damages in actions for libel or slander, and especially as to the possible effect of actual malice upon the element of damages which arises from mental suffering and injury to the feelings. It will be observed that the dissenting opinion does not question the correctness of the principles formulated in the majority opinion, but merely takes the view that the instructions of the trial court when considered as a whole were not out of harmony with those principles and were not likely to have misled the jury. The portion of the charge of the trial court which is quoted in the dissenting opinion does, indeed, seem to bring out very clearly the point which is made in the majority opinion, that actual malice may, in some instances at least, be properly considered in determining the extent of the mental suffering and injury to the feelings which constitute an element of compensatory damages. As pointed out in the majority opinion, however, there were some parts of the charge from which the jury might have gained the impression that compensatory damages might, even independently of this consideration, be enhanced by virtue of actual malice. In many jurisdictions, of course, the rule as to exemplary or vindictive damages in actions for libel is much more liberal than the rule which prevails in Connecticut; and in such jurisdictions actual malice is an important factor in determining the amount of such damages; but, allowing for the difference in rules as to such damages, the discussion of the subject in the majority opinion is so clear as to amount almost to a demonstration of its own correctness.

trial in an action brought to recover damages for alleged slander and libel. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John H. Barnes and J. J. Desmond, for appellant:

In actions for libel and slander in this state only compensatory damages are allowed when only general damages are claimed.

Hassett v. Carroll, 85 Conn. 37, 81 Atl. 1013, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 333.

Plaintiff, if the verdict is in his favor, is entitled to recover such actual damages as the jury may find to be the direct and proximate result of the publication, but not speculative or remote damages.

25 Cyc. 530.

Where special damage is not essential to the action it may still, of course, be proved at the trial to aggravate the damages, if it has been properly pleaded. The same particularity is required whether the words be actionable per se or not.

Odgers, Libel & Slander, 2d ed. p. 230.

When the plaintiff claims compensation for consequences of the injury which he has not yet experienced, he must prove with reasonable certainty that such consequences are to happen.

25 Cyc. 535; Sedgw. Damages, 9th ed. § 172.

The plaintiff does not allege in his complaint that he was damaged or injured in his reputation. His demand is only for such damages as follow from the uttering of the false words charged in the complaint, and the damages are therefore compensatory only.

Hanna v. Sweeney, 78 Conn. 493, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 907, 62 Atl. 785.

The court should not refer to a particular fact for consideration as to the credibility of a witness.

Taylor v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 560, 100 S. W. 393; 12 Thomp. Trials, §§ 2304, 2421.

The judge is at liberty, in the exercise of a sound discretion, both in civil and criminal cases, to give to the jury a caution touching the credence to be given to the testimony of witnesses who have sworn falsely, in conformity with the maxim, "Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus."

12 Thomp. Trials, § 2423; State v. McDevitt, 69 Iowa, 549, 29 N. W. 459.

Messrs. Roderick M. Douglass and Joseph T. Fanning, for appellee:

Truth is always a justification of the spoken or written words, but it must be pleaded if the defendant would take advantage of it in his defense.

Bailey v. Hyde, 3 Conn. 463, 8 Am. Dec. 202; Williams v. Miner, 18 Conn. 464; L.R.A.1918C.

No evidence was produced as to plaintiff's character.

Goodno v. Hotchkiss, 38 Conn. 656, 92 Atl. 419; Swift v. Dickerman, 31 Conn. 293; Flint v. Clark, 13 Conn. 367.

Repetitions of the slander showed malice in speaking and writing the words complained of.

If defendant had not attempted a justification by pleading the truth of his statements, such statements would have to be considered false and as being beyond the reach of any evidence intended to establish their truth. If the statements cannot be proved to be true, then there is nothing to be done except to take them as being false, and no attempt to prove them true can be made unless the truth is alleged.

Swift v. Dickerman, 31 Conn. 285; Donaghue v. Gaffy, 53 Conn. 51, 2 Atl. 397.

The damages may include compensation for future injury from the evil words.

Upon the question of damages, the malice of the defendant suggests considerations which could not with propriety be overlooked in trying to reach a just decision in a case of slander or libel.

Treat v. Browning, 4 Conn. 417, 10 Am. Dec. 156; Flint v. Clark, 13 Conn. 361; Williams v. Miner, 18 Conn. 472; Woodruff v. Richardson, 20 Conn. 288; Height v. Hoyt, 50 Conn. 586; Rogers v. Fitzgerald, 72 Conn. 731, 43 Atl. 551.

It was not error to consider mental suffering and injury to the feelings of the plaintiff in estimating general and compensatory damages.

Wheeler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint charges in the first three counts three separate slanders and in the fourth count a libel. As to the first, second, and fourth counts, the defendant admits the speaking and writing alleged.

The charge in each count is adultery, and hence constitutes words actionable in themselves.

The legal consequence of the speaking of the defamatory words was the creation of a legal presumption that the slanders were false, and made without legal excuse, that is, with malice; and hence the plaintiff, in the absence of proof of the truth of the charge or that it was a privileged communication, would be entitled to general damage.

As to the libel, the defendant having given proof of his intention, and it not appearing that the defendant was requested in writing to retract the charge and had failed to comply, the plaintiff could not recover damages unless he proved that the defendant published the libel with actual malice; that is, with malice in fact. Upon such proof, and in the absence of proof of the truth of the charge, and that it was a privileged communication, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover not only his actual or compensatory damages, but also what we term punitive or exemplary damages. The law presumes some damage from the use of defamatory words, and the person slandered is entitled to recover damages for all the injury done his reputation and his feelings, and for all the mental suffering, which are the proximate result of the defamation.

In addition to the recovery of these general or compensatory damages, if the plaintiff prove that the defamatory words were uttered with actual malice, he may recover what is termed in our law punitive or exemplary or vindictive damages,—damages by way of punishment,—which by our rule are limited to the expenses of the litigation less the taxable costs. In fact and effect, these damages also are compensatory, as Chief Justice Torrance pointed out in Hanna v. Sweeney, 78 Conn. 492, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 907, 62 Atl. 785.

The jury found the issues for the plaintiff, and the findings present the case of unfounded charges of adultery persistently made against the plaintiff, and with vindictive malice. If deductions for punitive damages of the most generous estimate be made, it would leave the general or compensatory damages at a very large sum. There is no claim of special damage, and there are no facts recited in the findings which show any disturbance of the feelings or the mind of the plaintiff.

Assuming the plaintiff's character as of the best, the actual or compensatory damages for injury to his reputation and feelings and for mental suffering were assessed by the jury at a higher value than any similar case in our jurisdiction.

In view of the conclusion we have reached in regard to the charge on the subject of damages, and to the fact that the evidence is not a part of the record, we omit passing upon the claim that the damages are excessive.

In different parts of the charge the trial court instructed the jury as to the subjects of compensatory damages and exemplary damages in accordance with our rule, and substantially as stated in Hassett v. Carroll, 85 Conn. 37, 81 Atl. 1013, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 333. The trial court went further, and, among other things, said: "If the plaintiff is not satisfied with such damages (that is, actual or compensatory damages), then the burden is on him to prove actual malice, or malice in fact, for the purpose of enhancing or increasing the damages."

Again: "Malice issued to be the principal ingredient in actions of slander, and damages to a great extent depend upon its existence in fact."

Again: "Actual malice may be proved, however, in such a case, for the purpose of enhancing or increasing the damages, and the jury may consider all of the evidence in the case in order to determine whether there was actual malice, to determine the degree of malice which prompted the defendant's conduct."

Again: "The absence of malice in fact in those cases where the law presumes malice is not a defense to the action. However honest may have been the motive, if the words are in themselves slanderous the fact that they were uttered without malice is never a full defense to the action. It is simply to be considered by you upon the question of damages. So that if there is much malice it is proper for you to assess more damages. If there is little or no malice, the damages should be only actual or nominal."

Again: "If the jury find that the defendant has in bad faith pleaded a justification of the words uttered and published by him, and if he has attempted to support that plea by false testimony in court, it is proper for the jury to give, and it may give at its discretion, increased damages therefor."

Again: "Upon the question of damages, the malice of the defendant will likely cut the largest figure in your deliberations."

Again: "If you find for the plaintiff, the damages, being almost entirely within your judgment, may range anywhere from merely nominal to what is sometimes called exemplary or vindictive damages, according to the degree of the malice."

And then follows a correct statement of our rule of exemplary damages.

Two principles of guidance, it is more than likely, the jury obtained from these instructions: (1) The greater the malice the greater the damage; (2) the amount of the damage is within the discretion of the jury.

Neither is sound. They savor of the common-law rule of punitive damages, which does not prevail in this state. Compensation, not punishment, is the foundation of our action of slander and libel. These quotations from the charge sustain the defendant's criticism that these instructions left it open to the jury to aggravate or increase the actual or compensatory damages if they found the charges to have been made with actual malice. The correctness of this instruction is the main ground of the appeal. If the actual or compensatory damages can be thus increased, it must follow that their absence would mitigate the actual damage. While malice is said to be a necessary ingredient of the action of slander and libel, it has, except in the aggravated cases of actual malice, no significance save to mark the defamation as one without legal excuse. It does not lessen one's injury to know that the slanderer did not intend the injury, or that he acted in good faith. No amount of proof that the slander was without actual malice will lessen the injury, and no amount of proof that it was made with actual malice can increase or enhance the damage which measures the reasonable compensation for the injury done. "The time, place, manner, and other circumstances of the preparation and publication of defamatory charges," as well, as the language of the charge, are admissible facts, tending to prove the extent of the injury to the reputation and feelings, and tending to prove the malice of the charge. Hassett v. Carroll, 85 Conn. 23, 37, 81 Atl. 1013, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 333.

The existence of actual malice is one of the relevant and material circumstances in an action of slander or libel. It may tend to spread the charge of the slander or libel, or it may induce the hearers or readers to treat it more lightly than they would an utterance from a less prejudiced source. It may be that the reputation will not suffer as much if the hearers and readers know the motive of the charge to be actual malice as when they believe the charge is made in good faith and without malice, or it may be exactly the reverse. Each case must be governed by its own circumstances and setting. Further proof of actual malice may disclose the injury to be greater in consequence of the publication of the charge in actual malice, and hence the compensatory damages will be greater because assessed in proportion to the actual injury.

The effect upon the feelings of him against whom the charge is made may be greater where he knows and must carry with him the knowledge that another entertains actual malice against him. So his mental suffering from the defamation may be greater from his consciousness of the malicious motive behind the charge. And such injury to his feelings and his mental suffering may arise whenever the knowledge that this charge was made in actual malice comes home to him. The injury may be increased by the presence of actual malice, and hence it is said that proof of actual malice may aggravate the damage. What it does is to increase the injury, and the damage which accrues is compensation for the increased injury.

This is the doctrine of the Massachusetts court; damages allowed are compensatory, punitive damages are never allowed. Faxon v. Jones, 176 Mass. 206, 208, 57 N. E. 359. In Burt v. Advertiser Newspaper Co. 154 Mass. 238, 245, 13 L.R.A. 97, 28 N. E. 5, Judge Holmes summarized their rule: "The damages recovered are measured in all cases by the injury caused. Vindictive or punitive damages are never allowed in this state. Therefore any amount of malevolence on the defendant's part, in and of itself, would not enhance the amount the plaintiff recovered by a penny, and reasonable cause to believe the charges, or absolute good will, would not cut it down."

Idem, Schattler v. Daily Herald Co. 162 Mich. 115, 128, 127 N. W. 42.

The true rule is that actual damages cannot be mitigated or enhanced, but every fact which tends to show that the injury was less or more than if these facts did not exist is admissible, for these show the extent of the actual injury, and that measures the limit of the compensatory damages.

The terms "aggravation" and "mitigation" of damages are used in the books and in our own reports in connection with actual damage or actual compensation. Such a use of these terms is confusing. For example, it is often said that evidence of the plaintiff's character is admissible either in aggravation or mitigation of the damages. What is meant is that the character of the plaintiff is one of the essential facts affecting the extent of the injury done. If it is good, the damage is greater; if bad, less.

Our rule of punitive or exemplary damages has been applied from an early date to all tortious injuries which are wanton or malicious. Linsley v. Bushnell, 15 Conn. 225, 236, 38 Am. Dec. 79; Beecher v. Derby Bridge & Ferry Co. 24 Conn. 491, 498. We applied it in actions of negligence, trespass, deceit, and assault; but perhaps the first instance in a libel or slander action was in Ward v. Dick, 47 Conn. 300, 304, 36 Am. Rep. 75. We have not always made the distinction between compensatory and punitive damages with clearness. Nor have we at all times kept clear the limitations which our rule places upon the award of punitive damages. Thus, in Haight v. Hoyt, 50 Conn. 583, 586, it is stated: "Malice is a principal ingredient in the action of slander, and damages to a great extent depend upon its existence in fact." And in Arnott v. Standard Asso. 57 Conn. 86, 93, 3 L.R.A. 69, 17 Atl. 361, it is said: "Damages are to be graduated by the degree to which the motive is unjustifiable and improper." In the first instance the court was treating of punitive damages, and what was said in this connection shows that the court had a clear conception of the distinction between compensatory and punitive damages. In the second instance the question of damages formed no part of the appeal, and whether the remark is applicable to compensatory damage or to punitive we cannot tell. In Ward v. Dick, 47 Conn. 304, 36 Am. Rep. 79, we said proof of malice in speaking the words charged is admissible, "and may tend indirectly to increase the damages for speaking the slanderous words charged in the declaration by showing the degree of malice in speaking them. It is a circumstance to be considered in estimating damages for the cause of action alleged in the declaration and proved, but is not of itself a cause for which damages may be directly assessed in that suit." This may have referred to punitive damages, but if not, it does not permit the actual or compensatory damages to be increased. It says that the proof of malice may indirectly increase the damages, and this would be true in case the injury to the feelings was augmented or mental suffering increased by the fact that the charge was made in actual malice. That would be measuring the extent of the actual damage and giving compensation for it. It would not authorize an increase of the compensatory damages beyond the point of compensation for the injury done. Properly read, we think that neither Ward v. Dick nor any of our decisions reaches the point of saying that the compensatory damages may be increased if actual malice be found.

Very generally the authorities hold that good intention, good faith, and the absence of actual malice are not admissible in mitigation of the actual or compensatory damage. Taylor v. Hearst, 118 Cal. 366, 50 Pac. 541; Callahan v. Ingram, 122 Mo. 369, 374, 43 Am. St. Rep. 583, 26 S. W. 1020; Young v. Fox, 26 App. Div. 261, 271, 49 N. Y. Supp. 634; Rearick v. Wilcox, 81 L.R.A.1918C.

Ill. 77, 81; Garrison v. Robinson, 81 N. J. L. 497, 501, 79 Atl. 278; Candrian v. Miller, 98 Wis. 164, 171, 73 N. W. 1004; Clair v. Battle Creek Journal Co. 168 Mich. 467, 473, 134 N. W. 443; Massee v. Williams, 124 C. C. A. 492, 207 Fed. 235; Palmer v. Mahin, 57 C. C. A. 41, 120 Fed. 741.

Some of the authorities thus holding assert generally that actual malice has no place in a trial for the actual or compensatory damages and is only important in the claim for punitive damages. But this leaves out of consideration the fact that malice is one of the circumstances surrounding the defamation, and all such are necessary considerations in estimating the compensatory damage, and may affect the extent of the mental suffering and injury to the feelings.

The trial court did not limit the estimate of the compensatory damages in the case of proof of actual malice. On the contrary, it left open to the jury the extent of the increase of damages due to actual malice. It made the presence or absence of malice the factor upon which all but nominal damages should hang. And it left the amount of the damage to be measured wholly by the discretion of the jury if actual malice was found. This was erroneous, and the extraordinary damages found demonstrate that they accepted the instructions as conferring upon them a discretion without limit.

The other exceptions require but brief notice. The charge that the jury might consider future damages as one of the elements of recovery was correct. The damages were to be assessed once for all. The court did not err in indirectly expressing its opinion in its comments upon the evidence. Nor were the instructions so argumentative in character as to be erroneous. The trial court was within our rule, so frequently announced as to forbid present repetition.

Complaint is made of the charge: "But if you do find that he wrote them, and has testified here falsely about it, then you are at liberty to consider that circumstance in weighing his other testimony, for it is always proper for the jury, if they find a witness has testified falsely in one particular, to consider that in deciding what weight they will give to his other testimony. The doctrine is sometimes referred to as falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus; that is, false in one thing, false in all. But it is not a principle of law that if you find a witness false in one particular that you should disregard his testimony entirely. You may do so if you are satisfied from it that he is unworthy of belief, but it does not follow that you must do so."

It is said that the failure to state that the false testimony must have been made knowingly, wilfully, or intentionally made this instruction erroneous. While this addition would have conformed the instruction to that usually given, it was not essential in view of what the trial court did say. It said that if the jury found that the defendant had "testified falsely" in some particular they might "consider that in determining what weight they will give to his other testimony," and that they might disregard the defendant's testimony "if satisfied from it that he is unworthy of belief." This latter phrase was the full equivalent of the phrase, "that he had knowingly testified falsely."

There is error and a new trial is ordered.

Roraback and Shumway, JJ., concur.

Beach, J., dissenting:

I dissent because the charge of the court on the subject of damages appears to me to be correct. The court said, inter alia: "Under our law it is not the purpose of this action, that is, an action of libel and slander, to punish the defendant for his offense, but to compensate the plaintiff for his injuries. . . . If you come to the question of damages, you will give the plaintiff such damages as in your opinion will fairly compensate him for the injury done to his reputation by reason of the defamatory words."

Then, after correctly pointing out the considerations which might influence the jury in estimating general compensatory damages, and repeating the rule that "if the jury finds that the statements were false as claimed by the plaintiff, the plaintiff is entitled to such damages as would be a compensation for the injury sustained as the natural or probable consequence of the slander or libel," the court charged the jury upon the relation of actual malice to compensatory damages, as follows: "When the words uttered or published are in themselves actually libelous or slanderous, the mental suffering occasioned by the publication of the defamatory words may be taken into consideration by the jury for the purpose of estimating general and compensatory damages. And it has been held that, because a libel or slander involves an injury to the feelings of the plaintiff as well as to his reputation, his injury may be greater if the defamatory words are uttered with express malice than if there is only the malice which the law implies from intentionally doing that which in its natural tendency is injurious."

It was after thus correctly instructing the jury on the subject of general compensatory damages that the court told the jury that the damages, "being almost entirely within your judgment, may range anywhere from merely nominal to what is sometimes called exemplary or vindictive damages, according to the degree of malice," and then properly instructed them that "damages beyond the actual compensation for the injury" were to be limited to the expenses of litigation, less taxable costs.

When the above-quoted portions of the charge are added to the collection of excerpts contained in the opinion, it seems to me that no logical basis is left for the conclusion that the court did not surround its charge upon the subject of damages with proper and sufficient limitations.

Loss of the sight of an eye because of the lodgment in the artery of an embolus due to a bodily condition, while insured is under strain in lifting, is not within a policy insuring against loss by accident exclusive Messrs. Beard & Pickett for appellant.

Mr. Ralph W. Gilbert for appellee.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee company insured the appellant, Joseph Salinger, "against bodily injury sustained . . . through accidental means . . . and resulting directly, independently, and exclusively of all other causes," in total or partial disability. Salinger was a merchant in Shelbyville, and, while in the act of lifting a bundle of boxes filled with corsets, and weighing about 24 pounds, to a shelf somewhat higher than his head, he noticed that he could not distinctly see the numbers upon the boxes. Thinking the trouble was with his glasses, Salinger removed them for the purpose of cleaning them, and found that he had lost the sight of one of his eyes. He was sixty years old, was in good health, and suffered no pain.

Salinger filed this action against the company to recover $2,500, the amount fixed by the policy for the loss of an eye, claiming that he had lost his eye through accidental means resulting directly, independently, and exclusively of all other causes. The answer traversed the petition and affirmatively alleged that Salinger was afflicted with embolus, and that said disease and his bodily condition resulting therefrom were the causes of the loss of his eye. At the conclusion of all the testimony the court peremptorily instructed the jury to find for the defendant, and Salinger appealed.

Four witnesses testified, Salinger and Dr. Buckner for the plaintiff, and Drs. Heflin and Pfingst for the company. All of these physicians examined Salinger. Salinger testified to the loss of his eye in the manner and on the occasion above narrated. The physicians agreed that Salinger lost his eye from embolus, which is the technical name for a floating clot in the blood vessels. It caused the blindness of appellant by lodging in the central artery of his eye, thus cutting off the blood supply and preventing circulation.

When asked if the effort which Salinger had made in placing the boxes upon the shelf could have caused the loss of his eye, Dr. Buckner testified that it might have been a factor in bringing about the result; that it might not have occurred if Salinger had not made the exertion, and that Salinger might have lost his eye from embolus if he had not made the exertion. Upon cross-examination Dr. Buckner further stated that if it had not been for the existence of this foreign substance in the artery, causing embolus, then no manner of exertion or force that Salinger might have employed in putting the boxes on the shelf would have caused the loss of his sight, and he would not say that the plaintiff's loss of his sight was independent of all other causes. It was Dr. Buckner's professional opinion that the exertion upon the part of the plaintiff had to co-operate with his bodily condition in order to cause the loss of his sight, and that Salinger would not have lost his sight from the effort he made in placing the boxes, independently of his bodily condition.

Dr. Heflin, a physician of nineteen years' experience, testified that he found Salinger's condition was due to embolus in the central artery of the left eye; that his condition would exist irrespective of any external force or violence; that his loss of sight was caused from the condition of his body, and not from the exertion he had made, and that it would not be possible for an exertion of that kind to cause the loss of an eye independently of any other cause.

Dr. Pfingst, a physician in active practice for more than twenty-two years, corroborated Dr. Heflin. Indeed, there is practically no substantial difference in the testimony of Drs. Buckner, Heflin, and Pfingst concerning the cause of the plaintiff's misfortune; they substantially agree that it was brought about by his bodily condition, and that it would not have been possible for him to lose his sight by the slight exertion he exercised independently of his bodily infirmity.

So the question for decision is reduced to this proposition, Does an intentional exertion constitute "accidental means" of injury within the provision of the policy? It may be treated as established by the great weight of authority that an injury is not produced by accidental means within the terms of an accident insurance policy, where it is the direct, though unexpected, result of an ordinary act in which the insured intentionally engages. The rule is stated as follows in 1 C. J. page 426: "If a result is such as follows from ordinary means, employed voluntarily, and in a not unusual or unexpected way, it cannot be called a result effected by accidental means."

As to previous diseased condition as affecting liability for death or injury from accident, see notes to Stanton v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 445, and Moon v. Order of United Commercial Travelers, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1203.

In Clidero v. Scottish Acci. Ins. Co. [1892] 19 R. 355, 29 Scot. L. R. 303, Lord Adam said: "A person may do certain acts, the result of which acts may produce unforeseen consequences, and may produce what is commonly called accidental death, but the means are exactly what the man intended to use, and did use, and was prepared to use. The means were not accidental, but the result might be accidental. Now if that is so, where does the question of accident come in here? There is no evidence that anything unusual or exceptional occurred as to the means or cause of this death. The man was just doing what he meant to do, and apparently a most unfortunate and unexpected result happened, —the man's death."

In Shanberg v. Fidelity & C. Co. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1206, 85 C. C. A. 343, 158 Fed. 1, where the policy insured against disability or death, "resulting directly, and independently of all other causes from bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means," it was held that the company was not liable for the death of the insured from a rupture of the heart, the walls of which had been weakened from fatty degeneration, the immediate inciting cause of the rupture being either overexertion while assisting in carrying a heavy door, or deep breathing following the exertion, neither of which was accidental. In that case the court said: "Had the assured, while assisting in carrying the door, lost his balance and fallen and struck upon some unforeseen object, or slipped on the ice, his death might be said to have resulted from violent or accidental means, and, assuming that there was no want of due diligence on his part, would doubtless be covered by the policy. But, from the facts as disclosed by the record in this case, we do not think it can be said that the rupture of the assured's heart, and which caused his death, was in any sense the result of an accident. He engaged in carrying this door for his own convenience; he encountered no obstacle in doing so; he accomplished just what he intended to, in the way he intended to, and in the free exercise of his choice. No accident of any kind interfered with his movements, or for an instant relaxed his self-control."

Again, in Schmid v. Indiana Travelers' Acci. Asso. 42 Ind. App. 493, 85 N. E. 1032, where Schmid was insured against injuries arising from physical bodily injury through external, violent, and accidental means, and died as a result of physical exertion and the rarefied conditions of the atmosphere, while climbing the steps of a Colorado hotel, L.R.A.1918C.

it was said he died from doing what he intended to do, although the result was not anticipated, and that his death was not the result of accidental means.

Likewise, in Rock v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 172 Cal. 462, L.R.A.1916E, 1196, 156 Pac. 1029, the insured undertook to carry a heavy casket down a flight of stairs. The exertion which he assumed was, however, beyond his strength, and imposed on his vital organs a burden they could not bear. The result of his exertion was a dilation of the heart, resulting in death. In carrying the casket he did not slip or stumble, nor did it fall against him; his entire purpose was carried out, in precisely the manner designed and intended by Rock. Under these circumstances it was held that Rock's death was not caused through accidental means.

Lehman v. Great Western Acci. Asso. 155 Iowa, 737, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 562, 133 N. W. 752, is a well-considered case. There the policy insured plaintiff "against the effects of personal injury caused solely by external, violent, and accidental means," and the question was whether disability from appendicitis caused by overexertion in bowling arose from accidental means within the terms of the policy. In holding the plaintiff could not recover the court said: "The act of bowling in itself was not an accidental means, for it was voluntary. The act in itself did not cause the appendicitis. There is no evidence tending to show that without the intervening accidental result of swollen and strained muscles, causing friction of the appendix by their irregular action, the disability complained of could have resulted. The accidental means, therefore, causing the disability was not the external and violent act of bowling, but the internal condition of swollen and strained muscles. . . . Finally, it is to be borne in mind that in this case there is no evidence whatever of any slipping or falling, or of any straining of the muscles other than the intentional strain put upon them in the voluntary and intentional act of bowling. Such a strain was not an accidental strain; and if it produced an unintentional result and consequent injury, nevertheless the resulting injury, and not the means producing it, was accidental."

To the same effect, see Appel v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 86 App. Div. 83, 83 N. Y. Supp. 238, id. 180 N. Y. 514, 72 N. E. 1139.

After reviewing the cases, the supreme court of Iowa in the Lehman Case, speaking through Judge McClain, further said: "In all of these cases we have recognized the necessity of proximate connection between some accidental means and the injurious result complained of, and according to the great weight of authority such proximate connection must appear. It is not sufficient that there be an accidental—that is, an unusual and unanticipated—result. The means must be accidental; that is, involuntary and unintended. Thus, in United States Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Barry, 131 U. S. 100, 33 L. ed. 60, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755, it was held that, 'if a result is such as follows from ordinary means voluntarily employed, in a not unusual or unexpected way, it cannot be called a result effected by accidental means; but that if, in the act which precedes the injury, something unforeseen, unexpected, unusual, occurs, which produces the injury, then the injury has resulted through accidental means;' and the court sustained a recovery in that case for an injury following the voluntary jumping from a platform, on the ground that the evidence tended to show some unforeseen or involuntary movement, turn, or strain of the body, or some unforeseen circumstance causing the injured person to alight in a different position or way from that which he intended or expected. And this case is followed, under quite similar circumstances and reasoning, in Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Schmaltz, 66 Ark. 588, 53 S. W. 49, 74 Am. St. Rep. 112, in which our case of Feder v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 107 Iowa, 538, 43 L.R.A. 693, 70 Am. St. Rep. 212, 78 N. W. 252, was distinguished on the ground that no unusual or unexpected exertion there appeared."

Smouse v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 118 Iowa, 436, 92 N. W. 53; Cobb v. Preferred Mut. Acci. Asso. 96 Ga. 818, 22 S. E. 976; and Streeter v. Western U. Mut. Life & Acci. Soc. 65 Mich. 199, 8 Am. St. Rep. 882, 31 N. W. 779, are to the same effect.

In Smith v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 219 Mass. 147, L.R.A.1915B, 872, 106 N. E. 607, it was held that the death of the insured from spinal meningitis, caused by the penetration of streptococcus germs into the brain as a result of snuffing through a nasal douche too violently, was not caused by accidental means, the court saying: "The deceased did exactly what he intended to do. This particular act of inhalation, though harder or more violent than usual, was not, so far as appears, harder or more violent than he intended it to be. There was no shock or surprise during the inhalation which made him draw a deeper breath than he intended to draw, nothing strange or unusual about the circumstances. The external act was exactly what he designed it to be, though it produced some internal consequences which he had not foreseen. Accordingly, there was no bodily injury effected through a means which was both external and accidental. But it is only for a death resulting from injury effected through such means that the defendant is made responsible by the policy. It is not sufficient that the death, or the illness that caused the death, may have been an accidental result of the external cause, but that cause itself must have been, not only external and violent, but also accidental."

Many illustrative cases are collected in Stone v. Fidelity & C. Co. 133 Tenn. 672, L.R.A.1916D, 536, 182 S. W. 252, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 86, a case strikingly like the case at bar in its controlling facts. In that case the policy, like the one at bar, insured Stone "against bodily injury sustained . . . through accidental means, and resulting directly, independently, and exclusively of all other causes, in immediate, continuous, and total disability." Stone contracted a cold while attending a football game in November, 1913, which resulted in lumbago. After medical treatment and the debility resulting from a purgative, and while lying in bed, Stone had a paper brought, reached for it, and raised it suddenly above his head, when his strong blood pressure caused a rupture of the retina, destroying the sight of one eye. There, as here, the loss of sight was caused by a "clot of blood resting upon the nerve of the eye or in the retina," and it was claimed that the loss of sight resulted wholly from accidental means. It was held that Stone could not recover under his policy because, while the result was not foreseen, the cause that produced the result was not an accident, but an ordinary movement executed as intended. In the course of the opinion the court said: "The general rule is that an injury is not produced by accidental means, within the meaning of this policy, where the injury is the natural result of an act or acts in which the insured intentionally engages. A person may do certain acts the result of which produces unforeseen consequences resulting in what is termed an accident; yet it does not come within the terms of this contract. The policy does not insure against an injury that may be caused by a voluntary, natural, ordinary movement, executed exactly as was intended. Therefore, to determine the matter, we look, not to the result merely, but to the means producing the result. It is not sufficient that the injury be unusual and unexpected, but the cause itself must have been unexpected and accidental. Re Scarr [1905] 1 K. B. 387, 2 B. R. C. 358, 92 L. T. N. Attention is especially directed to the very excellent notes on the subject in 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 563, and 1 Ann. Cas. 787. These notes illustrate the subject by statements of the facts. In the foregoing cases no liability was found, because the injury was not produced by accidental means."

The note to the above case in Ann. Cas. 1917A, page 88, contains a collection of the cases upon the subject. See also annotation in 2 B. R. C. 367.

As above stated, there is no real contradiction in the testimony in this case as to what caused the loss of plaintiff's eye, the three physicians agreeing that Salinger would not have lost his sight in the absence of his bodily condition caused by the clot in the blood vessels. Consequently, under the rule above announced, his injury was not caused by accidental means within the terms of the policy.

In peremptorily instructing the jury to find for the defendant the Circuit Court ruled correctly.

Judgment affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

LANDESMAN-HIRSCHHEIMER COMPANY, Apts.,
v.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY.

(— Ky. —, 199 S. W. 1050.)

Carrier — baggage — sample trunks.

1. A carrier which, in accordance with custom, knowingly accepts and checks as baggage a drummer's sample trunks, is liable for their loss to the same extent as if they contained personal baggage.

For other cases, see Carriers, II. o, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — absence of notice of contents — effect.

2. A carrier is not liable for loss of a drummer's sample trunk accepted as baggage without notice of the character of its contents.

For other cases, see Carriers, II. o, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(January 18, 1918.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Common Pleas Branch, Third Division, of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County, sustaining a demurrer to the amended petition and dismissing an action brought to recover damages for the loss of a trunk of samples, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — As to liability of carrier for loss of drummer's baggage, see annotation following this case, post, 108. L.R.A.1918C.

Mr. O. H. Harrison, for appellant:

The delivery of baggage of a passenger to a railroad is a bailment for hire, and the carrier is responsible for ordinary negligence, and unquestionably liable for gross negligence.

Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Miller, 156 Ky. 680, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 819, 162 S. W. 73.

It is now the custom of the railroads to receive sample trunks of the commercial traveler exactly on the same terms, conditions, and charges as personal baggage, and for this reason they are responsible to the same extent in each case; and especially is this the case when they have knowledge of the contents of the trunks.

Messrs. B. D. Warfield and Helm & Helm, for appellee:

Plaintiff, without giving notice of defendant of the contents of his trunk, which was merchandise, checked the trunk as baggage, which was equivalent to a representation by the passenger that the trunk belonged to him and contained only such articles as are properly classed as personal baggage.

If the trunk contains anything other than personal baggage, and the owner does not expressly so state to the agent, or obtain a special contract for such transportation, the carrier is not presumed to know the contents which are not disclosed, and it is a fraud, or unfair inducement, which will exempt the carrier from all responsibility under the contract.

Matthews, 114 Ky. 973, 60 L.R.A. 846, 102 Am. St. Rep. 316, 72 S. W. 302.

Sampson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A drummer carrying a trunk of samples bought of the appellee, Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, a ticket from Madisonville, Kentucky, to Hopkinsville, Kentucky, and caused his trunk of samples to be checked as baggage. On arrival at Hopkinsville he presented his check and requested the trunk of samples, and it was discovered that the railroad company had negligently delivered the trunk with its contents to some third person without a check. Thereupon the wholesale company for whom the drummer was the salesman instituted this action against the railroad company, averring ownership of the samples, of the value of $586.50, and the trunk, of the value of $20, and that it was paying the expenses of its traveling salesman, and the same amounted to at least $50, and that it lost business on account of the railroad company's failure to deliver the trunks, from which it would have realized a profit of $500.

The railroad company denies its responsibility, because, it asserts, a passenger may only carry as baggage such articles as he requires for his personal use and convenience in the nature of wearing apparel and such other articles as may not unreasonably be designed for his pleasure, business, or convenience on a journey which he is prosecuting, and that merchandise or drummers' samples cannot be included.

Upon motion several paragraphs were stricken from plaintiffs' petition, and a demurrer sustained to the remainder thereof, with leave to amend. Amendment was filed, and a demurrer against sustained, and, plaintiff declining to plead further, the action was dismissed.

The petition as amended, omitting the formal parts showing the right of plaintiff to sue, the value of the trunk and contents, and the capacity of the defendant railroad company to sue and be sued, and prayer for relief, avers that it was a universal custom of the defendant railroad company, a common carrier, at the time of the checking of the trunk in question, to receive and check trunks containing merchandising samples upon exactly the same terms and conditions as the personal baggage of the traveling public, and that the trunk of the plaintiff, when delivered at the depot in Madisonville and offered to the depot agent to be checked, was in appearance one employed to carry drummers' samples, and not personal baggage, and that the agent then knew that said trunk contained merchandise samples, and not personal baggage, at the time same was received and checked to be carried from Madisonville to Hopkinsville; that thereafter the defendant company, by its gross negligence and by and through the gross negligence of its depot agent at Hopkinsville, delivered said trunk and its contents to some third person without demanding or receiving from said third person a check or receipt for the same, and that to so deliver a trunk bearing a check was gross negligence for which the company was responsible.

"Baggage" is defined to be the necessary appendages of a traveler,—personal apparel, and such effects as a passenger requires for his personal use and convenience in the prosecution of a journey. As an incident to the passenger's contract for transportation the carrier transports a certain reasonable amount of baggage. It is a part of the contract as much as the transportation of the person. It is, however, sometimes incorrectly referred to as free baggage. In the case of Illinois C. R. Co. v. Matthews, 114 Ky. 979, 60 L.R.A. 846, 102 Am. St. Rep. 316, 72 S. W. 302, this court held:

"If the carrier elects to receive and transport that as baggage which in fact is freight, and which it would have the right to refuse to take as baggage on its passenger trains, it ought to be liable therefor upon the same terms as if it were baggage. But this is not because of its common-law liability therefor, but because it has agreed by special contract for a consideration to be so bound. The elements of such a contract are sufficiently satisfied by an acceptance of the package or trunk by the carrier for transportation as baggage, with knowledge of its contents. Hutchinson, Carr. 1st ed. § 685; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Capps, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 35; Jacobs v. Tutt (C. C.) 33 Fed. 412; Central Trust Co. v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. (C. C.) 39 Fed. 417; Humphreys v. Perry, 148 U. S. 627, 37 L. ed. 587, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 711.

"If the carrier accepts as baggage articles or merchandise not properly having that character, with knowledge that they are offered for transportation as baggage, he thereby waives any objection on that ground, and his liability therefor is the same as that with reference to baggage in general. The carrier is under no obligation, however, to make inquiry as to the contents of trunks offered to be checked as baggage. And if merchandise is checked under the form of baggage or mingled with articles of baggage without the carrier's knowledge, he is not liable therefor. While actual knowledge is not necessary to charge the carrier with liability for merchandise checked as baggage, if the circumstances are such as to indicate the fact, yet the mere appearance of the trunk or case offered to be checked as one ordinarily in use for carrying merchandise or samples will not in itself charge the carrier with knowledge that it does contain merchandise rather than personal baggage." 6 Cyc. 668.

At common law the carrier is responsible as an insurer only for the personal baggage of the passenger, and not for merchandise or such articles as properly constitute freight. It has even been held that, where the trunk or receptacle contains other articles than personal baggage, and the carrier is not informed of the fact, it is a deception upon the carrier as to such articles, and as to such they are not covered by the carrier's contract. This rule, however, has been modified to some extent by custom. A very great part of the business between manufacturers and wholesalers, on the one hand, and retail merchants, on the other, is carried on through the medium of traveling salesmen or drummers carrying samples in trunks or cases. Where by general custom a railroad carries trunks containing merchandise samples as the personal baggage of drummers, it will be liable, as a common carrier, in the same manner and to the same extent as for personal baggage: or, if a railroad company receive trunks containing merchandise samples as the personal baggage of a drummer at the time knowing the contents of the trunks, it expressly contracts to transport the same and be responsible therefor in the same manner and to the same extent as if the same were personal baggage.

In this case it is alleged that the railroad company received and accepted the trunk containing the samples with full knowledge of the contents of the trunk, and, further, that it was the universal custom of the defendant railroad company to so receive and carry drummer's samples. In either event the railroad company would be responsible for the samples in the same manner and to the same extent as if they were properly personal baggage. The rule is different, however, where a deception is practised, or where the real nature of the contents of the trunk or case is withheld. Nor can it be said that the railroad must take notice of the nature and contents of a trunk merely from its outside appearance. The rule seems to be that, where a trunk is presented as baggage, it may be received by the railroad company upon the implied assurance that the same contains only personal baggage belonging to the passenger; and if it afterwards appear that the trunk or package contained merchandise or other articles not properly coming within the term "baggage," the carrier will not be responsible even though the so-called baggage be wholly lost, and that through the ordinary negligence of the carrier. Some of the states by statutes have modified this common-law rule, but it remains unchanged in this jurisdiction, except in some slight degree. Such an act was passed in 1914 by our general assembly, but without an enacting clause, and was held invalid for that reason only.

The petition, as amended, stated a cause of action, and the demurrer should have been overruled.

Judgment reversed for proceedings consistent herewith.

Annotation—Liability of carrier for loss of drummer's baggage.

The earlier cases upon this question will be found in a note to New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. Shackleford, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1035.

For cases involving the liability of a carrier for the loss of sample merchandise which turn upon the fact that the merchandise was not the property of the passenger, rather than upon its nature, see the note to Lusk v. Bloch, post, 114.

A carrier is not bound to carry an agent's samples as baggage; but when it does so without any special contract, it is liable for the loss thereof. Wilkinson v. Lancashire R. Co. [1906] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 619, 75 L. J. K. B. N. S. 603, 94 L. T. N. S. 820, 22 Times L. R. 591.

So, the courts will take notice of a custom of railroads to carry samples as baggage, and in so carrying them, the L.R.A. 1918C.

railroads place such trunks on the same footing as other baggage, and must be held to the same liability. Fleischman v. Southern R. Co. (1907) 76 S. C. 237, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 519, 56 S. E. 974.

A contract on a mileage ticket providing that "merchandise of any description is not considered as baggage, and none of the carriers honoring this ticket are liable in any way for the promptness or condition of any samples which may be carried by the purchaser thereof," was held to differentiate between merchandise in the usual acceptance of the term and agent's samples, and not to exclude a trunk containing samples from being considered as baggage. Southern R. Co. v. Dinkins & D. Hardware Co. (1912) 139 Ga. 332, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 806, 77 S. E. 147.

In Wingate v. Pere Marquette R. Co.

(1912) 172 Ill. App. 314, photographs of furniture which had valuable notes on the back as to the wood, etc., which covered the entire line a salesman was selling, and which are not otherwise completely covered by catalogue or samples, were held to be baggage, for the loss of which the carrier was liable. However, see McElroy v. Iowa C. R. Co. (Iowa) infra.

And while goods or samples carried for the purpose of making sales are not baggage in the ordinary sense of the term, a carrier may become liable as for ordinary baggage by accepting such articles with knowledge. Southern R. Co. v. Dinkins & D. Hardware Co. (Ga.) supra. See also Landesman-Hirschheimer Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. ante, 108.

So, where the carrier's baggageman was informed when he checked plaintiff's baggage that plaintiff was a salesman and the baggage consisted of samples, its contention that the samples were not baggage was entirely without merit. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Lilly (1911) 1 Ala. App. 320, 55 So. 937. And in McKibbin v. Wisconsin C. R. Co. (1907) 100 Minn. 270, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 489, 110 N. W. 964, it was held that a carrier was liable where there was a general custom to check sample trunks as baggage, and the size and shape of the trunks were such that the baggageman must have known of their nature.

And in Tamarin v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1914) 244 Pa. 100, 90 Atl. 433, affirming (1913) 53 Pa. Super. Ct. 83, where sample trunks were received by an agent without inquiry as to their contents, and with no representation by the passenger as to the matter, a small excess weight charge being paid, it was held that the carrier was liable for negligent injury, at least as a bailee for hire.

And under a statute requiring a carrier to carry sample baggage up to 150 pounds in weight free for adult passengers, it is liable for the loss of samples where negligence is shown, even though it might not be liable as an insurer. Baack D. & B. Millinery Co. v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1914) 177 Mo. App. 282, 164 S. W. 175.

But in Doherty v. Grand Trunk Western R. Co. (1915) 194 Ill. App. 354, it was held that a commercial traveler could not recover for the loss of merchandise carried by him for delivery to customers, in an action for loss of baggage.

In Merritt v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. (1912) 49 Pa. Super. Ct. 219, it was held that the carrier was under no obligation L.R.A.1918C.

to carry merchandise in the form of agents' samples as baggage, and it was not liable for the loss of such samples without its negligence; but there were other elements to relieve it from liability as an insurer, such as the fact that the passenger did not accompany the trunk to its destination; and, in any event, the liability of the carrier at the time the trunk was destroyed by fire in its baggage room was only that of a warehouseman.

In Nathan v. Woolverton (1910) 69 Misc. 425, 127 N. Y. Supp. 442, affirmed in (1911) 147 App. Div. 908, 131 N. Y. Supp. 1130, an action for the loss of merchandise consisting of a large quantity of jewelry, in which it does not appear whether or not the jewelry was salesman's samples, it was held that the carrier was not liable for the loss when the nature of the articles was not disclosed.

In McElroy v. Iowa C. R. Co. (1907) 133 Iowa, 544, 110 N. W. 915, under a statute requiring a carrier to accept and carry ordinary baggage, it was held that a carrier is not liable for the loss of photographs of furniture, carried by a salesman to represent the goods he was selling. See, however, Wingate v. Pere Marquette R. Co. (Ill.) supra.

In McCoy v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (1909) 84 S. O. 62, 65 S. E. 939, an action for the loss of plaintiff's trunks containing samples, while in the carrier's depot, the only question discussed was as to whether the company was liable as a carrier or as a warehouseman only.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. W. F. Evans, R. A. Kleinschmidt, and Fred E. Sults, for plaintiffs in error:

Where a passenger carries as baggage property belonging to another person, the carrier, as to such property, is deemed to be merely a gratuitous bailee, and is liable to the owner only for the loss of property by gross negligence or wilful misconduct.

Hooker, C., filed the following opinion: This case was tried upon the following agreed statement of facts:

"It is hereby agreed by and between the undersigned, attorneys for both plaintiffs and defendants, that if witnesses were produced in open court in this case the evidence would be as follows:

"That on the 15th day of February, 1914, Albert R. Lee, traveling salesman in the employment of plaintiffs, purchased a ticket for first-class passage over the lines of the defendants from Madill, Oklahoma, to Hugo, Oklahoma; that the said Albert R. Lee delivered to the said defendants at Madill, Oklahoma, for transportation to Hugo, Oklahoma, his baggage, consisting of a sample trunk; and that said defendants received said baggage and promised and agreed to deliver the same to said Albert R. Lee, together with the contents thereof; that the said baggage was safely transported from Madill, Oklahoma, to Hugo, Oklahoma, and safely reached its destination at Hugo, Oklahoma at 11:35 A. M. on said 15th day of February, 1914, and was immediately placed in the baggage room. Thereafter, at about 12:10 P. M. of said date, the depot at Hugo was burned, and the said sample trunk and contents thereof destroyed.

"It is further agreed that the value of said trunk and contents was $568.15.

"It is further agreed that said sample trunk and contents was insured by the Hartford Fire Insurance Company of Hartford, Connecticut, and that on March 31, 1914, said insurance company paid to the plaintiffs the value of the trunk and contents, to wit: $568.15, and that the plaintiffs were the owners thereof.

"It is further understood that this suit is brought for the use and benefit of the Hartford Fire Insurance Company of Hartford, Connecticut, to reimburse it for the amount paid for the loss of said trunk and contents.

"It is further agreed that at the time the said Albert R. Lee delivered his sample trunk and contents thereof to the defendants, he was delivered a duplicate baggage check, being numbered A-359,324, which shows upon its face that said sample trunk contained excess weight of 100 pounds, for which the said Albert R. Lee paid 30 cents as excess baggage; said baggage check is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A' and made a part of this agreed statement of facts.

"It is further agreed that at the time said sample trunk and contents were delivered to the defendants at Madill, Oklahoma, the defendants had on file with the Corporation Commission of the state of Oklahoma their local passenger tariff, covering all its lines within the state of Oklahoma, a copy of which is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit B,' and made a part of this stipulation.

"It is further agreed that the cause of the said fire which destroyed the depot at Hugo is unknown.

"Dated this 9th day of September, 1915."

Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants in error against the railroad company, from which judgment an appeal is had to this court. It is asserted that this judgment is erroneous for two reasons: First, a carrier transporting merchandise of a principal as the baggage of his traveling agent without notice of the principal's ownership cannot be held liable for the loss of such baggage in a suit by the principal, unless the carrier is guilty of gross negligence or wilful misconduct; second, that recovery here is limited to $100 for the reason that the baggage check issued to Albert R. Lee, the traveling salesman, at the time the trunk in question was delivered by him to the company for transportation as baggage, placed a limitation in value thereon in the sum of $100. And tariff No. 117, which was in effect at the time thereof, on file with the Corporation Commission, also placed a limitation of $100, unless a greater valuation was declared by the passenger at the time the baggage was presented for transportation (which the agreed statement of facts does not show). For these two reasons the company denies liability here. If the contention of the company upon the first proposition named above is sustained, it will be unnecessary to consider the two reasons assigned by it.

Under the authority of this court in Kansas City, M. & O. R. Co. v. Fugatt, 47 Okla. 727, L.R.A.1916A, 545, 150 Pac. 669, the following principles are announced which may be accepted as the law of this state:

"A carrier, with respect to baggage accompanying a passenger, intrusted to its custody, incurs the responsibility of a common carrier of goods, and is liable as an insurer of the baggage, except where the loss or damage is caused by the act of God, the act of the owner, or by the public enemy.

"It is a matter of general knowledge, of which courts will take judicial notice, that common carriers by rail make a practice of carrying as baggage the sample trunks of traveling salesmen.

"Where a carrier accepts as baggage the sample trunks of a traveling salesman, with knowledge of their character, it thereby waives any objection on the ground that such trunks and contents are not properly baggage, and its liability therefor is the same as that with reference to baggage as defined in § 806, Rev. Laws, 1910."

This authority decides the question that the trunk here is property capable of being transported as baggage.

The company asserts that, in the absence of wilful misconduct, or gross negligence, it cannot be held responsible for the loss of this baggage for the reason that the relationship of the passenger and carrier between it and the defendant in error did not exist at the time the trunk was delivered by Albert R. Lee, the traveling representative of the defendants in error, to it for transportation as baggage. Numerous authorities are cited here to support this contention, all of which are to the effect that before the carrier can be liable as an insurer, this personal relationship of passenger and carrier must exist. The rule on this question is stated in Hutchinson on Carriers, §§ 1274, 1275, as follows:

"Sec. 1274. The owner of the property must, of course, stand in the relation of passenger to the carrier in order to fix upon him liability as a carrier of baggage. The carriage is ex vi termini incidental to the carriage of the owner as a passenger. If, therefore, that which would have been properly baggage had it been accompanied by the owner as a passenger, should, by accident or mistake, be accepted by the carrier for transportation without being accompanied by the owner, and when he is not or does not become a passenger, the carrier would not have it in his custody in the character of baggage, and would not be responsible for it as such. Of course, if he accepted such baggage for transportation, knowing that the owner was not and did not intend to become a passenger, he would accept it to be carried as freight, and would be liable for it as a common carrier of goods. But if he accepted it as baggage, supposing the owner to be a passenger, or about to become one, and it should turn out that he was not and did not become a passenger upon the journey upon which the goods were taken, the question would arise: In what character and under what responsibilities was it carried?"

"Sec. 1275. Having accepted it to be carried as baggage, will the law imply or impose upon him a different contract or duty from that which he undertook? For although the measure of the liability of the carrier of the baggage is the same as that of the common carrier of goods as freight, the risk incurred by the carrier in the two cases is not always the same. When the baggage is accompanied by the owner, as the carrier has the right to suppose will be the case, emergencies may arise in which his care and attention to it may preserve it from loss; and when his journey has been safely made, the carrier may at once deliver to him his baggage, instead of being obliged to keep it for him and thereby prolong his own responsibility. Therefore, to make him responsible as a common carrier of freight for that which he has accepted for carriage as baggage would be imposing upon him a somewhat different undertaking from that to which he had agreed. . . . Where, therefore, the owner of goods who has secured the right to be carried as a passenger tenders his goods as baggage, and the carrier, believing that they are to be accompanied by him, accepts them as such, he will thereby incur with respect to their safety the responsibility of a gratuitous bailee only if, through no fault of his, the owner does not become a passenger upon the journey upon which they are taken. And if the carrier should receive goods as baggage under circumstances which lead him to suppose that their owner has secured the right to be carried as a passenger, when in fact no such right has been or is intended to be acquired, the only duty, it is held, which the carrier would owe the owner, would be to abstain from wilfully or wantonly causing them injury."

Also the same author, in § 1276, says: "Since the carriage of baggage is incidental to the contract for the transportation of the passenger, it follows that if the property accepted by the carrier as the personal baggage of the passenger does not belong to him, but to another with whom no contract for transportation has been made, the owner, in the absence of proof that the carrier has been guilty of negligence, cannot recover for its loss or injury. . . ."

In Ruling Case Law, vol. 5, p. 178, it is stated: "In view of the character of baggage as property carried under, or as an incident to, the contract of transportation of the owner as a passenger, a general rule has been developed by the decisions to the effect that property moved by express, or otherwise, apart from the transportation of the person who owns it, cannot properly be considered as baggage, nor can the carrier be held liable therefor as such; and where a passenger carries as baggage property belonging to another person, the carrier, as to such property, is ordinarily deemed to be merely a gratuitous bailee, and is liable to the owner only for the loss of the property by gross negligence or wilful misconduct. In accordance with this rule a carrier cannot be held liable to a partnership for injury to firm property where it was carried as the personal baggage of one member."

In Bradley v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 147 Ill. App. 397, it is held: "The carrier's responsibility for baggage does not attach unless the relation of passenger and carrier has been established. One having a ticket cannot leave his baggage with the carrier and provide for its transportation in due course unless he himself intends at such time to proceed upon his journey. The carrier's liability with respect to baggage is an incident to the relationship of passenger and carrier, and if such relationship does not exist at the time of the carriage of the baggage, the only responsibility of the carrier is that of a warehouseman."

The supreme court of Kansas, in South-ern Kansas R. Co. v. Clark, 52 Kan. 398, 34 Pac. 1054, said: "The first question presented by the plaintiff in error is whether the railroad company sustained the relation of a common carrier to the plaintiffs, and is therefore liable for the loss of baggage stolen, without any claim of negligence on its part. . . . Personal baggage limited in quantity is usually transported by carriers of passengers as an incident to the transportation of the person, without extra charge. The contract to transport a passenger is usually a personal contract. If injury results to his person, or his personal effects, transported as baggage, there can be no doubt that the railroad company is liable to him, and him alone, when occurring under such circumstances as to create liability. The fact that he is engaged in the service of another at the time, and that his transportation is paid for by his employer, cannot diminish his individual right to safe transportation. We fail to perceive that the facts that his fare is paid for by his employer, and that the occasion for his making the journey is the prosecution of the business of his employer, in any manner affect the contract with, or liability of, the railroad company. It does not appear in this case that, at the time he purchased his ticket, anything was said with reference to his employment, nor that, at the time he checked his baggage, any mention was made of the fact that the samples he carried belonged to the plaintiffs."

Likewise the court of appeals of Kansas in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Liveright, 7 Kan. App. 772, 53 Pac. 763, held: "Where the traveling salesman of a firm purchases two first-class tickets, and on these tickets procures trunks or sample cases, belonging to the firm, to be checked and transported by a railroad company as his personal baggage, without informing the railroad company as to the contents, value, or ownership of the trunks, held, that the railroad company is not liable to the firm if injury results to the contents of the trunks so transported as the personal baggage of their traveling salesman."

In Stimson v. Connecticut River R. Co. 98 Mass. 83, 93 Am. Dec. 140, it is held: "The defendants had no contract with the plaintiffs. Their contract was with Edwards, the plaintiffs' agent; and it was a strictly personal contract, for his safe transportation over the railroads, to which the carriage of suitable personal baggage was merely incidental. Edwards had no right to transport merchandise under cover of his L.R.A.1918C.

personal baggage; much less could he take merchandise in that manner which belonged to other persons, and thereby give them the rights of a contracting party against the defendants. . . . The count upon a contract, therefore, cannot be supported."

And in the syllabus the rule is announced: "Railroad company cannot be held liable, either to owner or agent, on its ordinary contract to carry a passenger, for losing samples of merchandise delivered into its charge by the agent of the owner as his personal baggage; nor in tort, except for gross negligence."

The doctrine announced in the Stimson Case was followed by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Alling v. Boston & A. R. Co. 126 Mass. 121, 30 Am. Rep. 667. In Wood v. Maine C. R. Co. 98 Me. 98, 99 Am. St. Rep. 339, 56 Atl. 457, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 306, it is said: "Where the owner did not intend to accompany his baggage the entire distance of his route, and it is admitted that he did not, in fact, accompany it over any part of the defendant's railroad, held, that the defendant did not incur the full responsibility of a common carrier of goods, and that at the time the trunk was rifled of its contents, the defendant was only liable as a gratuitous bailee."

In Brick v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 145 N. C. 203, 122 Am. St. Rep. 440, 58 S. E. 1073, 13 Ann. Cas. 328, the supreme court of North Carolina said: "Where a passenger carries as baggage property belonging to another person, the carrier, as regards such property, is a gratuitous bailee only, and is liable only for the loss of the property by gross negligence or wilful misconduct."

From the foregoing authorities it is a settled doctrine of the law that the owner of the property must stand in the relation of passenger to the carrier in order to fix upon the carrier the liability as a carrier of baggage, unless the carrier is advised of the fact and accepts the property as baggage with full knowledge. And, inasmuch as that relation under the agreed statement of facts here is not shown to have existed between the plaintiff below and the company here at the time the goods were destroyed, nor any claim of knowledge on the part of the company stated, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in the absence of gross negligence or wilful misconduct.

The judgment of the lower court is therefore reversed, and this cause is remanded.

Per Curiam:

Adopted in whole.

Petition for rehearing denied November 6, 1917.

Annotation—Carriers: liability in respect to property of third person in passenger's baggage.

This note does not include liability for articles intended as gifts when carried in passengers' baggage, such cases being collected in a note to Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Skinner, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 850.

Property of members of family.

A husband may recover for the loss of his wife's clothing which was contained in his trunk along with his own. Rogers v. Long Island R. Co. (1873) 1 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 396. Especially is this so where he paid for the clothing of the wife, and considered it a part of her necessary apparel. Burnes v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1912) 167 Mo. App. 62, 150 S. W. 1100.

And in Withey v. Pere Marquette R. Co. (1905) 141 Mich. 412, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 352, 113 Am. St. Rep. 533, 104 N. W. 773, 7 Ann. Cas. 948, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 309, it was held that a husband could recover for articles belonging exclusively to his wife, which were contained in his baggage and checked on tickets bought by him, the contract to carry him and his wife and their common baggage being a contract with the husband.

In Jones v. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. (1913) 184 Ill. App. 287, it was held that a small amount of jewelry which had belonged to the passenger's deceased wife was baggage.

A woman may recover in contract for her own clothing and that of infant children traveling with her, but not for her husband's clothing, household effects, and dresses of a daughter who did not accompany her. Callan v. Canada Northern R. Co. (1909) 19 Manitoba L. R. 141.

And books bought by a wife for her husband with money sent to her by him for that purpose constitute no part of her baggage. Hurwitz v. Hamburg-American Packet Co. (1899) 27 Misc. 814, 56 N. Y. Supp. 379.

A father clearly has a right to recover for the loss of wearing apparel of an infant. Curtis v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1878) 74 N. Y. 116, 30 Am. Rep. 271. Such articles are the property of the father, in his possession, and are properly a part of his baggage. Withey v. Pere Marquette R. Co. (Mich.) supra.

And where a father and minor daughter are traveling together, the contract for transportation being made by him and the baggage checks being delivered to him, he may sue for the loss of wearing apparel of the daughter even if it is conceded that the daughter has the sole right of using such apparel, as, legally being obliged to provide her with clothing, he would have such interest in it as to entitle him to sue. Baltimore Steam Packet Co. v. Smith (1865) 23 Md. 402, 87 Am. Dec. 575.

Plaintiff could not recover for the loss of a dress belonging to her mother, who was not traveling with her, and which was admitted not to be for plaintiff's use. Bullard v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1902) 21 Pa. Super. Ct. 583.

Property belonging to employer.

The following cases dealing with the liability of a carrier for the loss of sample merchandise carried by a traveling salesman and belonging to his employer include only such cases as involve the question of liability as depending upon ownership. For other cases involving liability for salesman's samples, see notes to New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. Shackelford, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1035, and Landesman-Hirschheimer Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. ante, 108.

It is generally held that the employers of a salesman cannot, at least in an action on the contract, recover for loss of or injury to sample merchandise checked by the salesman with no notice to the carrier that the baggage was not his own. Southern Kansas R. Co. v. Clark (1893) 52 Kan. 398, 34 Pac. 1054; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Liveright (1898) 7 Kan. App. 772, 53 Pac. 763; Stimson v. Connecticut River R. Co. (1867) 98 Mass. 83, 93 Am. Dec. 140; Alling v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1879) 126 Mass. 121, 30 Am. Rep. 667; Merritt v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. (1912) 49 Pa. Super. Ct. 219; Lusk v. Bloch, ante, 109.

Thus, in Stimson v. Connecticut River R. Co. (1867) 98 Mass. 83, 93 Am. Dec. 140, supra, the court said that the salesman had no right to transport merchandise under cover of his personal baggage; much less could he take merchandise in that manner which belonged to other persons, and thereby give them the right of contracting parties against the carrier. And in Talcott v. Wabash R. Co. (1892) 66 Hun. 456, 21 N. Y. Supp. 318, an action for the loss of baggage consisting of sample trunks, etc., of a salesman, the court, though deciding that the baggage agent had no authority to accept merchandise as baggage, gave as another ground for denying recovery that no attempt was made to show that the baggage agent was notified that the samples were the property of anyone but the passenger. And in Cattaraugus Cutlery Co. v. Buffalo, R. & P. R. Co. (1897) 24 App. Div. 267, 48 N. Y. Supp. 451, and Brick v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (1907) 145 N. O. 203, 122 Am. St. Rep. 440, 53 S. E. 1073, 13 Ann. Cas. 328, it was held that a carrier is liable only as a gratuitous bailee to the owner of property carried as baggage by its salesman.

While in Doherty v. Grand Trunk Western R. Co. (1915) 194 Ill. App. 354, it was held that a commercial traveler carrying as baggage articles of merchandise of his employer for delivery to customers could not recover for their loss in an action for loss of baggage.

But, in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Matthews (1903) 114 Ky. 973, 60 L.R.A. 846, 102 Am. St. Rep. 316, 72 S. W. 302, an action by a traveling salesman for injury to merchandise carried as baggage for his employers, partly as samples and partly for sale, the court said: "While it is true that a carrier cannot be made liable for the goods of another than the passenger or a member of his family traveling with him which may be included in the passenger's baggage, yet the facts in this case tend to show that, although the goods belonged to the wholesale merchants, by an agreement between them and appellee he had such an interest in them, by reason of his being responsible to them for their loss or damage, and required to replace them in such event, that they may fairly be treated as his for the purposes of this action. The damage fell upon him. They were being carried for him. He was the passenger."

And in Trimble v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1899) 39 App. Div. 403, 57 N. Y. Supp. 437, and Ft. Worth & R. G. R. Co. v. I. B. Rosenthal Millinery Co. (1895) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 29 S. W. 196, it was held that an employer may recover for the loss of baggage owned by it and carried by its salesman, in an action on the contract, although the contract for carriage was made by the agent, and no notice of the ownership of the property was given to the railroad company. See also Sloman v. Great Western R. Co. (1876) 67 N. Y. 208. Trimble v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) supra, was affirmed in (1900) 162 N. Y. 84, 48 L.R.A. 115, 56 N. E. 532, but the question of ownership was not discussed.

And in Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Hochstim (1896) 67 Ill. App. 514, it was held that a carrier which checked as baggage the sample cases of a salesman, after being informed of the nature of their contents, is liable for their loss; and the fact that the articles lost were not the property of the agent purchasing the ticket, but of his employer, is immaterial to defendant, and the real owner could sue for the loss.

In Grant v. Newton (1850) 1 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 95, it was held that a father who employed his son in his own business and sent him on a journey, placing in his possession for use while so employed a trunk, clothing, etc., for the purposes of the journey, may maintain an action on the case for the carrier's neglect of duty, resulting in the loss of the trunk.

The papers carried by an insurance agent, relating to the business of and belonging to the insurance company are not baggage. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Georgia Home Ins. Co. (Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Blackmar) (1904) 85 Miss. 7, 67 L.R.A. 646, 107 Am. St. Rep. 265, 37 So. 500, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 306.

The owner of baggage could not recover for its loss when it was taken as the personal baggage of a servant, the owner going on another train. Becher v. Great Eastern R. Co. (1870) L. R. 5 Q. B. (Eng.) 241, 39 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 122, 22 L. T. N. S. 299, 18 Week. Rep. 627.

Miscellaneous cases.

In Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Knight (1895) 58 N. J. L. 287, 33 Atl. 845, it was held that a partnership could not, in an action on the contract, recover for injury to a typewriter carried by one of the partners as baggage, the contract of carriage being with the partner, and the firm not being in privacy.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Dickson (1916) — Ala. App. —, 73 So. 750, certiorari denied in (1917) — Ala. —, 74 So. 1005, where one of two joint owners of several dogs purchased tickets to be used by themselves and others composing a hunting party, and arranged for the transportation of the dogs, it was held that the contract for transportation of the dogs was, in effect, for the sole benefit of the two owners, and they were authorized to sue for the carrier's breach of duty growing out of the contract.

In Dunlap v. International S. B. Co. (1867) 98 Mass. 371, it was held that where a passenger carried in his baggage property belonging to another passenger, who apparently had no baggage, the carrier was not liable for the loss of such property.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MINNESOTA EX REL. VIRGINIA &amp; RAINY LAKE COMPANY

v.

DISTRICT COURT OF ST. LOUIS COUNTY et al.

(— Minn. —, 164 N. W. 585.)

Workmen's compensation — freezing.

1. Freezing is a personal injury caused by "accident," within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

For other cases, see Master and Servant, II. a, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — sufficiency of evidence.

2. A workman froze his thumb while working as a swamper. His work required him to cut and handle timber, and his hands came in contact with the snow. His work was several miles from camp, and there were no facilities for warming. The weather was severely cold. A finding that the freezing arose out of the employment is sustained by the evidence.

Dibell, C., filed the following opinion:

Certiorari to review the judgment of the district court of St. Louis county awarding compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act to Joe Niemi, an employee of the relator, Virginia & Rainy Lake Company. The injury for which the award was made was the freezing of the employee's thumb, which resulted in its amputation. The questions are these:

(1) Whether freezing is a personal injury caused by accident, within the meaning of the Compensation Act.

(2) If so, whether the accident arose out of the employment, within the meaning of the act.

1. The statute exacts from the employer compensation "in every case of personal injury or death of his employee, caused by accident, arising out of and in the course of employment." Gen. Stat. 1913, § 8203. The term "accident" is defined as follows: "The word 'accident' as used in the phrases 'personal injuries due to accident' or 'injuries or death caused by accident' in this act shall, unless a different meaning is clearly indicated by the context, be construed to mean an unexpected or unforeseen event, happening suddenly and violently, with or without human fault and producing at the time, injury to the physical structure of the body." Gen. Stat. 1913, § 8230 (h).

That freezing is a personal injury within the meaning of the Compensation Act is not open to question. McManaman's Case, 224 Mass. 554, 113 N. E. 287; Larke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 90 Conn. 303, L.R.A.1916E, 584, 97 Atl. 320, 12 N. C. C. A. 308. Nor is it to be questioned that within the statutory definition it is an "unexpected and unforeseen event," nor that it is an event "producing at the time injury to the physical structure of the body." It has been held an accident within a statute giving compensation in case of an accidental injury, but not defining accident. Days v. L.R.A.1918C.

S. Trimmer & Sons, 176 App. Div. 124, 162 N. Y. Supp. 603; Canada Cement Co. v. Pazuk, Rap. Jud. Quebec 22 B. R. 432, 12 D. L. R. 303, 7 N. C. C. A. 982. So has a sunstroke, which affords a helpful, though not perfect, analogy. Ismay v. Williamson [1908] A. C. 437, 77 L. J. P. C. N. S. 107, 99 L. T. N. S. 595, 24 Times L. R. 881, 52 Sol. Jo. 713, 42 Ir. L. T. 213; Morgan v. The Zenaida, 25 Times L. R. 446, 2 B. W. C. C. 19; Davies v. Gillespie, 105 L. T. N. S. 494, 28 Times L. R. 6, 56 Sol. Jo. 11, 5 B. W. C. C. 64. The difficult question is whether the requirement that the event be one "happening suddenly and violently" excludes it. Freezing comes suddenly and violently, as distinguished from gradually and naturally or in ordinary course. In common talk a sudden or violent death is one occurring unexpectedly, and not naturally or in the ordinary course of events. In some such sense the words are used in the statute. Their effect is not to exclude from accidental injuries all except such as result from physical force applied from without. It is suggested in argument that these particular words, with others employed in the same connection, were used in caution to exclude occupational and other diseases. Whether such is their effect is not for decision here. We think that a fair construction of the statutory definition does not exclude freezing, and we hold that it is a personal injury caused by accident, within the meaning of the act.

2. It is not questioned that the employee received his injury in the course of his employment. It is contended that it did not arise out of his employment. It is not enough that it occurred while work was in progress. It must have arisen under such circumstances that a causal connection is traceable between the employment and the freezing, and the freezing must be more than a consequence, shared by the community in general, of exposure to cold.

The freezing occurred in January, 1916. The workman was employed by the relator as a swamper in the woods in the northern part of St. Louis county. He was cutting and handling timber and making roads for swamping. He used an ax, handled the timber with his hands, and they came in contact with the snow. The weather was severely cold. He was some 4 or 5 miles from camp. There were no facilities for warming. The building of fires was not permitted. The evidence fairly sustains the view that the character of the employee's work subjected him to a risk of freezing not shared by the generality of the community, and sustains the finding that the freezing arose out of the employment. In the following cases, all involving injuries by freezing, and ings that the freezing arose out of the employment were sustained: McManaman's Case; Larke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co.; Days v. S. Trimmer & Sons; and Canada Cement Co. v. Pazuk,—supra. In the following, findings that it did not were sustained: Warner v. Couchman [1911] 1 K. B. 351, 80 L. J. K. B. N. S. 526, 103 L. T. N. S. 693, 27 Times L. R. 121, 55 Sol. Jo. 107, 1 N. C. C. A. 51, 4 B. W. C. C. 32; Karemaker v. The Corsican, 4 B. W. C. C. 295.

The general question of what constitutes an accident arising out of employment has had consideration by this and other courts. See State ex rel. Duluth Brewing & Malting Co. v. District Ct. 129 Minn. 176, 151 N. W. 912; State ex rel. People's Coal & Ice Co. v. District Ct. 129 Minn. 502, L.R.A.1916A, 344, 153 N. W. 119, 9 C. C. A. 129; Mahowald v. Thompson-Starrett Co. 134 Minn. 113, 158 N. W. 913, 159 N. W. 565; 1 Bradbury, Workmen's Compensation, 398 et seq.; 1 Honnold, Workmen's Compensation, §§ 101 et seq.; notes in L.R.A.1916A, 40, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 4, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 498, and Ann. Cas. 1916B, 1293; 25 Harvard L. Rev. 401, 517. The case in review does not call for a discussion of the cases. It is enough to say that the finding that the injury was an accident arising out of the employment is sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

Bunn, J., dissenting:

I am not clear that it can be fairly said that freezing comes "suddenly and violently."

Messrs. S. M. Koefod and W. E. Rowe, for appellants:

Plaintiffs evicted defendants from a portion of the premises, depriving them of the beneficial use of the loading grounds to such an extent that they were damaged in a sum greater than the annual value of the use of the premises. Under such circumstances the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover any rent.

Mr. Walter L. Chapin, for respondents:

Defendants originally took possession as tenants of plaintiffs and held for several years, paying rent until the written lease on new terms was entered into. Possession continued under it and the year's rent was paid. Defendants cannot therefore be heard to deny the plaintiffs' title, as they have retained possession.

Taylor, C., filed the following opinion:

Defendants appeal from a judgment rendered on the pleadings.

The complaint sets forth a written lease by which plaintiffs rented to defendants a tract of land having a frontage of 400 feet in the townsite of New Roosevelt for the term of one year from and after the 1st day of November, 1911, for the sum of $320. The lease contained the usual provisions for re-entry, and the usual covenant by the lessees to surrender the possession of the premises to the lessors at the end of the term. The complaint further alleged that defendant took possession of the premises under the lease, occupied them during the year, and paid the rent therefor; that at the end of the year defendants surrendered the west 50 feet of the premises, but remained in possession of all the remainder thereof, and occupied and used the same for a period of four years after the term named in the lease had expired; and that the proportion of rent for the part of the premises retained by defendants was seven eighths of the rent for the entire premises; and demanded judgment therefor. The answer alleged that before making the written lease defendants had occupied the premises from time to time for short periods with the permission of plaintiffs, and had paid plaintiffs therefor; that at the time of making the written lease they had a large amount of timber products stored upon the premises; that they were required by plaintiffs either to take a lease for one year for $320 or to remove their property; that plaintiffs falsely represented that they were the owners of the land and entitled to the exclusive possession thereof; that the rent demanded was exorbitant, but to avoid the expense of removing their property defendants executed the lease, occupied the premises during the year, and paid the rental therefor; that before the end of the year they notified plaintiffs in writing that they would not surrender possession at the end of the term, would not renew the lease with plaintiffs, and would not recognize plaintiffs as the owners of the premises or entitled to possession thereof, but would recognize the Minnesota & Manitoba Railroad Company as owner of the land and would take a lease from that company therefor; that on November 1, 1912, defendants leased the premises from the railroad company, and have ever since held possession and occupied them under the railroad company; that after the 1st day of November, 1912, plaintiffs took possession of the west 50 feet of the land at a time when defendants were not occupying that part of the premises, and have ever since retained possession of such 50 feet; that the rental value of the part of the premises of which defendants retained possession did not exceed three fourths of the rental value of the whole premises; and that the value of the use of the whole premises did not exceed $40 per year. The answer further alleged that an action is pending, undecided, between the railroad company and plaintiffs to determine the title to the land; and that defendants are informed, and believe, that the railroad company is the owner thereof.

Plaintiffs made a motion for judgment on the pleadings for $240 per year, being three fourths of the rental value as fixed by the lease. This motion was granted, and judgment rendered accordingly.

Defendants do not question the rule that a tenant who has received possession of the leased premises from his landlord cannot dispute the title of the landlord until he has returned possession to the landlord or has been compelled to yield to a paramount title. Defendants concede that they received possession from plaintiffs, and make no claim that they have been compelled to yield to a paramount title. They rely for reversal upon the well-established rule of the common law that where a landlord wrongfully evicts his tenant from a part of the demised premises the whole rent is suspended until the possession of such part has been restored to the tenant. Christopher v. Austin, 11

N. Y. 216; Morris v. Kettle, 57 N. J. L. 218, 30 Atl. 879; Kuschinsky v. Flanigan, 170 Mich. 245, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 430, 136 N. W. 362, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1228; Halligan v. Wade, 21 Ill. 470, 74 Am. Dec. 108; Moore v. Mansfield, 182 Mass. 302, 94 Am. St. Rep. 657, 65 N. E. 398; 16 R. C. L. 953, § 461.

They contend that plaintiffs, by taking possession of the west 50 feet of the land, in effect evicted them therefrom, and in consequence thereof are not entitled to recover rent for the remainder of the premises. But the facts do not bring the case within the rule invoked. At the end of the year plaintiffs were entitled to the possession of the entire tract and defendants had covenanted to restore it to them. Plaintiffs found the west 50 feet unoccupied and took possession of it, as they had a right to do, but defendants retained possession of the remainder, and wrongfully refused to vacate. The landlord does not forfeit his rent under the rule invoked unless he has dispossessed the tenant of a part of the premises in violation of the terms of the lease. Here there has been no violation of the terms of the lease by plaintiffs. The only violation of the terms of the lease was the refusal of defendants to surrender the remainder of the leasehold at the end of the term. Retaining a portion of the premises gave plaintiffs the right to treat defendants as holding over, and except for the fact that plaintiffs took possession of a part of the land, they would have the right to collect the full amount of the rent, although defendants retained only a portion of the premises. Bless v. Jenkins, 129 Mo. 647, 31 S. W. 938; Ballance v. Peoria, 180 Ill. 29, 54 N. E. 428; Cavanaugh v. Clinch, 88 Ga. 610, 15 S. E. 673.

But plaintiffs, having taken possession of the unoccupied part of the land, must make a proportionate reduction in the rent. Defendants allege that the rental value of the whole tract is much less than the rental which they had agreed to pay, but, as they saw fit to remain in possession in violation of their covenant, and concede that the rental value of the portion retained by them is three fourths of the rental value of the whole tract, they are not in position to complain because plaintiffs elected to treat them as tenants holding over, and accepted their own apportionment of the rent by taking judgment for only three fourths of the rent reserved by the lease.

Without appearing to place much reliance thereon, defendants also invoke the rule that a tenant who has been induced to enter into the lease by fraud may attack his landlord's title if necessary to enable him to protect rights of which he is being deprived by the fraud. The facts do not bring the present case within this rule. The only misrepresentation charged is that plaintiffs asserted that they were the owners of the land, but the truth of this assertion is denied only upon information and belief; and it is admitted that plaintiffs are asserting their title and seeking to establish it in court against the adverse claimants. Defendants neither have nor claim any interest in the land, except such as they acquired under the lease from plaintiffs and the subsequent lease from the railroad company. While plaintiffs were in unquestioned possession of the land under claim of ownership, defendants voluntarily leased it from them, received possession from them, and have ever since retained such possession without interference by anyone. The lease impaired no rights of defendants in the land, and defendants, having taken possession under it, must restore such possession to plaintiffs before they can be heard to dispute plaintiffs' title. Sage v. Halverson, 72 Minn. 294, 75 N. W. 229; also numerous cases cited in note found in 4 Ann. Cas. at pages 108 et seq. If the mere fact that the landlord asserted that he was the owner when in truth he was not was sufficient ground for permitting the tenant to attack his landlord's title, the rule that a tenant is estopped from denying the title of his landlord would be well-nigh abrogated.

Judgment affirmed.

Annotation—Landlord and tenant: tenant holding part only of premises after expiration of term.

Various phases of holding over by tenant are treated in notes listed in the L.R.A. Indexes under "Landlord and Tenant."

In 2 Taylor on Landlord & Tenant, § 524, it is said: "If he has let the whole or any part of the premises to an undertenant who is in possession at the termination of the lease, he must eject him; otherwise he cannot render up that complete possession to which the landlord is entitled. And unless the entire possession is delivered up the tenant's responsibility for rent will continue, although it may have become impossible for him to give the landlord full possession, in consequence of the obstinacy or ill will of an undertenant to whom he has let a part or the whole of the premises, and who refuses to quit; for in such case the landlord may refuse to accept possession, and hold the original tenant liable."

A tenant who without the consent of the landlord retains possession of part of the premises must be considered as holding over as to all. Cavanaugh v. Clinch (1891) 88 Ga. 610, 15 S. E. 673 (see citation of same case, infra); Balance v. Peoria (1890) 180 Ill. 29, 54 N. E. 428; Nachbour v. Wiener (1889) 34 Ill. App. 237; Longfellow v. Longfellow (1864) 54 Me. 240; Bless v. Jenkins (1895) 129 Mo. 647, 31 S. W. 938 (see comment upon same case, infra); Dorr v. Barney (1877) 12 Hun (N. Y.) 259; Katz v. Schreckinger (1906) 52 Misc. 160, 101 N. Y. Supp. 743; HARWOOD v. MELONEY, ante, 118.

In Bless v. Jenkins (1895) 129 Mo. 647, 31 S. W. 938, the principle that a tenant holding over part of the premises at the expiration of the term is liable for the whole rent is stated with approval, although the decision appears to be based upon the finding that there was a new lease, under which the landlord had a right to refuse to accept a surrender of all or part of the premises.

A lessee from year to year of a store and wharf in connection therewith who, on the day the lease expired, vacated the store and tendered the keys to the lessor, but remained in possession of the wharf for about two weeks while selling the coal that he had previously placed thereon, must be considered as a tenant holding over, so as to incur liability for another full year's rent for the whole premises. Cavanaugh v. Clinch (1891) 88 Ga. 610, 15 S. E. 673. The court apparently based this decision upon the theory that a tenant who holds over on part of the premises holds over as to all, although there were facts involved which perhaps might have been sufficient to form an independent basis for the holding. The lessor had refused to accept the keys to the store on the ground that an agreement had been made for a continuance of the tenancy.

From what has been said it seems clear that had the landlord in HARWOOD v. MELONEY, 118, refrained from taking possession of any part of the demised premises he could have consistently claimed the whole rental as fixed in the lease, thus electing to treat the tenant as one holding over. But that does not prove his innocence of wrongful eviction as to part of the premises. If he elected to treat the tenant as one holding over at the rental fixed in the lease,—and his bringing the action shows that he did,—it would seem inconsistent to use his right to evict generally as a cover for the wrongfulness of his act in evicting from a part, because that right exists only on the assumption that he is not treating the tenancy as continuing under the lease. Consistency would seem to require the payment of rent for the use and occupation of the part retained without regard to the amount fixed in the lease, unless the facts clearly indicate a voluntary surrender of part of the premises by the tenant. If the case was one of voluntary surrender of a part, a proportionate part of the rent as fixed by the lease would perhaps be the correct measure, but the language used by the court seems to indicate that the landlord was permitted to play fast and loose by electing to treat the tenant as a hold-over and at the same time do with impunity acts that could be justified only upon the theory that there was no hold-over recognized by the landlord.

APPPEAL by defendant Wagener, from a judgment of the District Court for Boone County, in favor of plaintiff, in an action brought to enjoin defendant from collecting or transferring certain notes and mortgage given by plaintiff and his wife to her in settlement of a claim for damages. Cornish, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action in equity in which the plaintiff asked that the defendant be enjoined from collecting or transferring certain notes and mortgage given by plaintiff and his wife to defendant, in settlement of a claim for damages, on the ground that they were without consideration and obtained by duress and by undue influence and fraud. The trial court found that the notes were without consideration, canceled the instruments, and granted a perpetual injunction. Defendant appeals.

The controversy arose out of an occurrence at a church meeting, in which the plaintiff used language towards the defendant which she contended was slanderous and damaging. We are unable to agree with the trial court that the incident was of such trifling nature that the court can say, as a matter of law, that the words used were not slanderous, nor sufficient to base a claim for damages. What they were is in dispute. As interpreted from the German by some of the witnesses, they amounted to an accusation that defendant had an uncontrollable sexual desire, causing her to do an unmannerly and unwomanly act in forcing her way to a seat supposed to be occupied only by men.

We are of opinion, however, that, taking all the facts and circumstances into consideration, coercion was exercised upon the plaintiff by persons connected with the church other than defendant, to procure him to give the notes and mortgage in satisfaction of the demand, which, while not amounting to duress, did amount to a social and mental force exerted upon him, controlling the free action of his will, and preventing that voluntary action in the giving of the notes which equity will relieve against on the ground of undue influence. Hartnett v. Hartnett, 42 Neb. 23, 60 N. W. 362. The notes should be canceled and the plaintiff released from all liability thereon.

The event occurred March 31, 1915. This action, enjoining the defendant from bringing suit on the note, was begun April 14, 1915. It would be inequitable that defendant's claim for damages should be lost by the running of the Statute of Limitations during the time this action has been pending. The nature and extent of her claim have depended upon the results of this litigation. During its pendency she has not been free to otherwise prosecute it. While in this action she has defended upon the ground that undue influence was not exerted, she appears to have prosecuted her defense in good faith. Her situation may be likened to that of the person who has by mistake altered an instrument and yet may recover upon it. The principle is recognized in the rule that, because there may be a good-faith dispute whether an instrument was procured by fraud or duress, the party intending to rescind must do so within a reasonable time, if at all. The defendant, so electing, should in equity be permitted to plead, setting up her alleged cause of action against the plaintiff, and, upon issues being joined, the cause tried as a law action for damages. First Nat. Bank v. Gibson, 74 Neb. 236, 104 N. W. 174, 105 N. W. 1081.

The judgment of the District Court is modified and affirmed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings, as herein indicated.

Letton, J., concurring in affirmance and dissenting from modification of decree:

I concur in the affirmance, but dissent from the modification of the decree. The result of the modification is to hold that one who ratifies an illegal act, by seeking to sustain in court the validity of notes improperly extorted by duress, may, even after the Statute of Limitations has run by reason of the delay caused by the suit, recover upon the original cause of action, if any. It gives one who ratifies the act of a wrongdoer the option to stand upon the notes, and, if unsuccessful, to retrace his steps and begin again after the statute has run.

Morrissey, Ch. J., concurs in this special concurrence and dissent.

Annotation—Equity: suspension of operation of Statute of Limitations as incident to grant or denial of equitable relief.

Upon the general question as to the effect of an injunction against legal proceedings to suspend the operation of the Statute of Limitations, see notes appended to *Hunter v. Niagara F. Ins. It is a general rule that equity will not suffer a debtor who procures and keeps in force an injunction against the col-

Inst. v. Buchanan* (1882) 60 Miss. 490; Doughty v. Doughty (1854) 10 N. J. Eq. 347;

Lamb v. Ryan (1885) 40 N. J. Eq. 67; Barker v. Millard (1837) 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 572 (rule stated). In the application of this rule it has been held that where the holder of a paramount title to real estate was enjoined from asserting the same, equity will suspend the operation of the Statute of Limitations as to the person in possession of the land at whose instance action on the paramount title was enjoined. Kelly v. Donlin (1873) 70 Ill. 382.

Where a complainant was denied any relief, but the defendant established a note against him which he had been enjoined from disposing of or bringing action upon, the defendant will be given a judgment for the amount of the note, with interest, notwithstanding that during the pendency of the proceeding any remedy at law thereon had become barred by the Statute of Limitations. Yzaguirre v. Garcia (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 172 S. W. 139.

And see MACKE v. JUNGELS, ante, 121, holding that although a note is set aside on the ground that it was procured through duress, nevertheless, in giving such relief, equity may provide that the relief shall be without prejudice to the right to maintain an action at law upon the original cause of action to settle which the note was given, even though any remedy at law to enforce this cause of action would otherwise be barred by the Statute of Limitations.

But the mere mistaken belief on the part of the creditor, not induced by the debtor, that he has been enjoined from proceeding at law to collect his claim, is no ground for equitable relief enjoining the debtor from pleading the Statute of Limitations as a bar to any remedy on the claim. Chilton v. Scruggs (1880) 5 Lea (Tenn.) 308.

Equity, upon giving relief to the beneficiary by requiring a trustee of land to convey the same, may require such beneficiary to pay for improvements thereon by the trustee, even though action to recover the same would be barred at law by the operation of the Statute of Limitations. DeWalsh v. Brame (1896) 160 Ill. 415, 43 N. E. 597.

And likewise, where a conveyance of land was made to secure the payment of a loan, equity will make repayment of such money a condition of relief, although any remedy at law to enforce the loan is barred by the Statute of Limitations. Whitmore v. San Francisco Sav. Union (1875) 50 Cal. 145; Grant v. Burr (1880) 54 Cal. 298; DeCazara v. Orena (1889) 80 Cal. 132, 22 Pac. 74; L.R.A.1918C.

Hall v. Arnott (1889) 80 Cal. 348, 22 Pac. 200; Spect v. Spect, 88 Cal. 437, 13 L.R.A. 137, 22 Am. St. Rep. 314, 26 Pac. 203; Rodriguez v. Haynes (1890) 76 Tex. 225, 13 S. W. 296. And, as a condition of quieting the title to real estate as to an unpaid mortgage, equity may require payment of the mortgage, although any remedy to enforce payment thereof is barred by the Statute of Limitations. DeCazara v. Orena (1889) 80 Cal. 132, 22 Pac. 74; Booth v. Hoskins (1888) 75 Cal. 271, 17 Pac. 225.

In a proceeding to foreclose an equitable mortgage, equity may, as a condition of relief, provide that a portion of the proceeds of the foreclosure sale shall be paid to the holder of a legal mortgage on the property, the proceeds of whose loan were used to enhance the value of the property. The right to such relief is not affected by the failure of the holder of such mortgage to file a cross bill, nor by the fact that any remedy on the mortgage was barred by the Statute of Limitations. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Denver, L. & G. R. Co. (1903) 60 C. C. A. 588, 126 Fed. 46.

Where possession of land was decreed to the complainant, and the defendants, while in possession, had, in good faith, paid off and discharged certain mortgages on the land, relief to the complainant was conditioned on his paying these mortgages, although any remedy to enforce the same was barred by the Statute of Limitations. Hobson v. Huxtable (1908) 79 Neb. 340, 112 N. W. 658, 116 N. W. 278. A. G. S.

ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the State of Kentucky to review a judgment of the Chancery Branch of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County, holding personal property omitted from the original assessment of the deceased owner subject to a tax. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William W. Crawford, for plaintiff in error:

Bank deposits growing out of business done in a state have a situs there, and nowhere else.

Co. 138 Ky. 828, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 295, 129 S. W. 301; Com. v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co. 143 Ky. 314, 136 S. W. 1032; Hillman Land & Iron Co. v. Com. 148 Ky. 331, L.R.A.1915C, 929, 146 S. W. 776; Com. v. B. F. Avery & Sons, 163 Ky. 829, 174 S. W. 518.

Intangible property may acquire a business situs apart from the domicile of the owner and be taxable there and nowhere else.

v. West India Oil Ref. Co. 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 295; and see other notes there referred to.

The specific question whether deposits in a bank in one state are subject to property taxation at the domicile of the owner in another is considered at page 938 of the note in L.R.A.1915C, 903, on the general subject of situs, as between different states or countries, of personal property for purposes of taxation. The question as to an independent situs of debts or credits for purposes of taxation is considered at page 919 of the note last referred to; and the subject of a "business situs," so-called, of credits which are employed in a business conducted in a state other than that of the domicile of the owner, is considered at pages 923 et seq. of that note. The Kentucky court of appeals, having, both before and after the decision of this case, held that § 4020 of the Kentucky Statutes does not apply to bank deposits having a business situs outside of Kentucky, cannot apply it to the bank deposits here.

Messrs. Pendleton Beckley, George Cary Tabb, and Stuart Chevallier, for defendant in error:

The money on deposit in St. Louis belonged to a resident of Louisville; it had been accumulated from surplus earnings, and no part of it was used in, or connected with, any business in Missouri. Under these circumstances the principle of "mobilia sequuntur personam" applies, and the taxable situs of these deposits was Louisville, Kentucky.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit brought by the city of Louisville, Kentucky, to recover annual taxes for the years 1907 and 1908 in respect of personal property omitted from the original assessments to the owner, L. P. Ewald, in his lifetime. The facts as simplified for the purposes of argument here are that Ewald was domiciled in Louisville, but continued to carry on a business in St. Louis, Missouri, where he formerly had lived. Deposits coming in part if not wholly from this business were made and kept in St. Louis banks, subject to Ewald's order alone. They were not used in the business and belonged absolutely to him. The question is whether they could be taken into account in determining the amount of his Louisville tax. It would seem that some deposits were represented by certificates of deposit, but it was stated at the argument that no point was made of that. See Wheeler v. Sohmer, 233 U. S. 434, 438, 58 L. ed. 1030, 1036, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 607. We are to take it that all the sums are to be dealt with as ordinary bank accounts. The decision of the state court upheld the tax. 168 Ky. 71, 181 S. W. 1095; 171 Ky. 509, 188 S. W. 652; 172 Ky. 451, 189 S. W. 438.

So far as the present decision is concerned, we may concede, without going into argument, that the Missouri deposits could have been taxed in that state, under the decisions of this court. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 221 U. S. 346, 354, 55 L. ed. 762, 767, L.R.A.1915C, 903, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 550; Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. New Orleans, 205 U. S. 395, 51 L. ed. 853, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499. But liability to taxation in one state does not necessarily exclude liability in another. Kidd v. Alabama, 188 U. S. 730, 732, 47 L. ed. 669, 672, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 401; Hawley v. Malden, 232 U. S. 1, 13, 58 L. ed. 477, 483, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 201, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 842. The present tax is a tax upon the person, as is shown by the form of the suit, and is imposed, it may be presumed, for the general advantages of living within the jurisdiction. These advantages, if the state so chooses, may be measured more or less by reference to the riches of the person taxed. Unless it is declared unlawful by authority, we see nothing to hinder the state from taking a man's credits into account. But, so far from being declared unlawful, it has been decided by this court that whether a state shall measure the contribution by the value of such credits and chooses in action, not exempted by superior authority, is the state's affair, not to be interfered with by the United States, and therefore that a state may tax a man for a debt due from a resident of another state. Kirtland v. Hotchkiss, 100 U. S. 491, 25 L. ed. 558. See also Tappan v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 19 Wall. 490, 22 L. ed. 189.

It is true that the decision in Kirtland v. Hotchkiss concerned Illinois bonds, and that if they were physically present in the taxing state, Connecticut, a special principle might apply, as explained in Wheeler v. Sohmer, 233 U. S. 434, 438, 58 L. ed. 1030, 1036, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 607. See Stamps Comr. v. Hope [1891] A. C. 476, 484, 60 L. J. P. C. N. S. 44, 65 L. T. N. S. 268; Dacey, Conf. L. 2d ed. 312. But the decision was not made to turn upon such considerations; indeed, its reasoning hardly is reconcilable with them, or with anything short of a general rule for all debts. It is argued that in a later case this court has held the power of taxation not to extend to chattels permanently situated outside the jurisdiction although the owner was within it (Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Kentucky, 199 U. S. 194, 50 L. ed. 150, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 36, 4 Ann. Cas. 493); and that the power ought equally to be denied as to debts depending for their validity and enforcement upon a jurisdiction other than that levying the tax. But this court has not attempted to press the principle so far, and there is opposed to it the long-established practice of considering the debts due to a man in determining his wealth at his domicile for the purposes of this sort of tax.

The notion that a man's personal property upon his death may be regarded as a universitas and taxed as such, even if qualified, still is recognized both here and in England. Bullen v. Wisconsin, 240 U. S. 625, 631, 60 L. ed. 830, 835, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 473; Eidman v. Martinez, 184 U. S. 578, 586, 46 L. ed. 697, 702, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 515; Atty-Gen. v. Napier, 6 Exch. 217, 155 Eng. Reprint, 520, 20 L. J. Exch. N. S. 173, 15 Jur. 253. It has been carried over in more or less attenuated form to living persons, and the general principle laid down in Kirtland v. Hotchkiss, supra, has been affirmed or assumed to be law in every subsequent case. Bonaparte v. Appeal Tax Ct. 104 U. S. 592, 26 L. ed. 845; Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 29, 31, 35 L. ed. 613, 618, 619, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876; Savings & Loan Soc. v. Multnomah County, 169 U. S. 421, 431, 42 L. ed. 803, 806, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 392; New Orleans v. Stempel, 175 U. S. 309, 321, 44 L. ed. 174, 180, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110; Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 221 U. S. 346, 355, 356, 55 L. ed. 762, 767, 768, L.R.A.1915C, 903, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 550. It was admitted to apply to debts in Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Kentucky, 199 U. S. 194, 205, 50 L. ed. 150, 154, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 36, 4 Ann. Cas. 493. It is unnecessary to consider whether the distinction between a tax measured by certain property and a tax on that property could be invoked in a case like this. Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. 220 U. S. 107, 146, 162, et seq., 55 L. ed. 389, 411, 417, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 342, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1312. Whichever this tax technically may be, the authorities show that it must be sustained.

It is said that the plaintiff in error has been denied the equal protection of the laws because, if the argument is correct, which we have not considered, the decision in this case is inconsistent with earlier decisions of the Kentucky court. But with the consistency or inconsistency of the Kentucky cases we have nothing to do. Lombard v. West Chicago Park, 181 U. S. 33, 44, 45, 45 L. ed. 731, 738, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 507. We presume that, like other appellate courts, the Kentucky Court of Appeals is free to depart from precedents if, on further reflection, it thinks them wrong.

Judgment affirmed.

STANDARD ACCIDENT INSURANCE

Insurance — accident — drowning — ship sunk by submarine.

The drowning of an insured by the sinking of the vessel on which he is a passenger, L.R.A.1918C.

by the explosion of a torpedo from a submarine, is within a policy insuring against injuries effected solely by external, violent, and accidental means, and is not within a condition relieving an insurer from liability for injuries from explosives or those inflicted by any other person.

For other cases, see Insurance, VI. b, 3, c, in Dig. 1-52 N. 8.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Rock County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Affirmed.

Statement by Kerwin, J.:

The plaintiff, executrix of the will of Dr. Edmund F. Woods, deceased, brings this action to recover for the death of Dr. Woods, who had a policy of accident insurance in defendant company, upon the ground that he died from injuries effected solely by external, violent, and accidental means which caused his immediate death. The answer admits that the defendant carried said insurance policy, and sets up various defenses, and specifically alleges that the occurrence falls within certain exceptions to liability, stated in the contract of insurance.

The facts are substantially undisputed and were stipulated upon the trial. Dr. Woods was a passenger upon the steamship Arabic, which sailed from Liverpool, England, for New York on August 18, 1915; that said steamship Arabic was an unarmed passenger and mail boat, flying the English flag and plying between the cities of New York and Liverpool, England; that said Arabic, while proceeding through the Atlantic ocean and about 60 miles off the southwest coast of Ireland, was fired upon by a submarine with the purpose and intention of sinking said ship, said torpedo being fired with hostile intent and without notice or warning to the officers of said Arabic or anyone aboard of her; that the torpedo discharged at the Arabic struck below the water line and exploded, causing said Arabic to sink within six minutes after being struck; that the effect of the tearing and breaking upon said steamship Arabic, caused by the explosion of the torpedo, was below the decks of said steamship occupied by passengers; that shortly thereafter most of the passengers and crew were put into lifeboats and left the sinking ship. One lifeboat, containing some of the passengers and crew, did not get loose from said steamship and was sucked under or thrown into the water when the ship sank. The Arabic, after leaving Liverpool, did not stop at any point prior to the time when it was struck by the torpedo. Some time thereafter the body of said Woods was found on the southwest coast of Ireland, with a life preserver on, the body fully dressed, and upon the clothing on said body were papers, a watch, and other jewelry belonging to said Woods. A state of war at said time and for some time prior to said 18th day of August, 1915, existed and still exists between Germany, Austria, and other countries on the L.R.A.1918C.

one side, and Great Britain (including England) and other countries on the other.

The insuring clause of the contract in suit reads as follows: The Standard Accident Insurance Company "hereby insures the individual who purchases this ticket in person against the effects of bodily injuries received during the term of this insurance and effected solely by external, violent, and accidental means, subject to all the conditions and limitations hereinafter contained."

Under the title "Additional Provisions," subdivision F, appears the following: "This ticket is issued by the company and accepted by the insured with the understanding and agreement that no benefits will be paid for injuries, resulting fatally or otherwise, received under or in consequence of any of the following conditions:

(3) While engaged in aerial navigation, hunting, fishing, or on exploring expeditions, or under any circumstances from firearms of any kind or from explosives; or (4) from wrestling, lifting, racing or competitive games, or when inflicted upon the insured by himself or any other person, or received by the insured while insane, or inflicted by the insured upon himself while insane."

The case was tried by the court, and the court found that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. Judgment was entered accordingly in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, from which this appeal was taken.

Messrs. Lines, Spooner, & Quarles, for appellant:

The death of Dr. Woods, proximately following as a result of the discharge of firearms, brings the case squarely under § 3, subdivision F, of the policy, which provides: "... or under any circumstances from firearms of any kind or from explosives."

Kerwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended on the part of the appellant that the killing of Dr. Woods by the discharge of the torpedo falls within the excepted provisions of the policy referred to in the statement of facts. It is argued that the accident falls within the provision of the policy which excepts injuries resulting fatally or otherwise under any circumstances from firearms of any kind or other L.R.A.1918C.

explosives, and it is contended that the death of Dr. Woods brings the case under subdivision F of the policy, which provides, ". . . Or under any circumstances from firearms of any kind or other explosives," and where the injury is inflicted upon the insured "by any other person."

We are satisfied upon the conceded facts that the contention of appellant cannot be sustained. It was found by the court below that deceased came to his death by drowning, and we think this finding is amply supported by the evidence. Whether he escaped from the ship and was subsequently drowned or was pulled under the vessel as one of the occupants of the last lifeboat does not appear, but it is quite clear from the evidence that he was not killed or injured by the explosion of the torpedo, therefore the explosion was not the direct cause of his death. It quite conclusively appears that he did not go down with the ship, so it follows that he must have come to his death, by "external, violent, and accidental means" within the meaning of the policy,—not by the explosion. It being established that the deceased came to his death by drowning, the drowning was either accidental or suicidal, and it cannot be said to be suicidal under the facts of this case because the law is well settled that there is a presumption against suicide; hence the conclusion must follow from the established fact that the cause of the drowning was accidental.

If, as the proof here warrants, Dr. Woods had gotten into one of the lifeboats that arrived safely, he would not have lost his life. Nor does the fact that he lost his life by being drowned after the explosion bring the accident within the exception in the policy referred to. The inference to be drawn from the evidence is that after the Arabic was struck Dr. Woods adjusted upon himself a life preserver, got into a lifeboat, and by some accident thereafter was drowned. There is no evidence that he was injured by contact with any explosive or any object displaced or put in motion by the explosive. No inference can be drawn that the injury which caused the death of Dr. Woods was inflicted upon him by himself or by any other person. It may well be said that had no explosion occurred which resulted in sinking the Arabic, Dr. Woods would not have lost his life; but it cannot be said under the circumstances of the case that the explosion was the direct cause of his death within the meaning of the exception in the policy. In order to escape liability under the policy, it must appear that the explosion was the direct cause of the injury to the insured.

We do not regard it necessary to discuss authorities referred to in appellant's brief. It is sufficient to say that they are not applicable to the situation here. The material facts in the instant case are undisputed, and upon these facts we think the judgment of the court below was right, and should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Annotation—War casualties as within accident insurance.

It will be noticed that the court in WOODS v. STANDARD ACC. INS. CO. ante, 127, decided that the drowning of the insured by the sinking of the vessel on which he was a passenger, by the explosion of a torpedo from a submarine, was within a policy insuring against injuries effected solely by external, violent, and accidental means, and that it was not within a condition of the policy relieving the insurer from liability for injuries from explosives, or those inflicted by any other person.

Although there is, as yet, little authority upon the question here annotated, considerable litigation similar to that involved in the WOODS CASE will undoubtedly result from the present war, and already there has been some adjudication along this line.

In Letts v. Excess Ins. Co. (1916) 32 Times L. R. (Eng.) 361, a broker through whom the insured had previously obtained insurance was instructed to renew an accident policy at the former rate, and filed a slip for a policy that excluded war risks. A policy was issued at the old rate, insuring against accident directly causing death, which provided that the insurer should not be liable in respect of death "directly or indirectly caused or contributed to by war or by death resulting from disease or natural causes," etc., and that the insurer should not be "liable in respect of any death of the assured by an accident happening outside the limits of Europe unless same be agreed by special indorsement," and a typewritten slip was attached to the policy, providing that "notwithstanding anything herein contained, the assured is fully covered while on a journey from the United Kingdom to the United States of America and/or Canada, while there, and on return." The insured, while on his way from the United States to England, was drowned when the Lusitania was torpedoed. The insurer defended on the ground that the insured's death was directly and indirectly caused or contributed to by war within the meaning of the first conditions of the policy, while the plaintiff contended that the typewritten clause showed that that condition had no application to the case of a death caused during a voyage L.R.A.1918C.

from the United States. The defendant made the further contention that the policy should be rectified so as to give effect to the slip presented by the broker, which expressly excluded war risks. The court held that the broker was the insured's agent, and refused to construe the typewritten slip as fully covering the insured against war risks, stating that the first condition included a number of accidents from other causes besides war risks in which the insurer was not to be held liable, and that it did not think that it was the intention of the insurer that the insured was to be covered against all those cases of accident while he was on a journey to the United States, and that it could not distinguish between those classes of accidents and accidents caused by war, and stating that it read the clause as meaning that the insured was to be as fully covered while on his journey to America and back as he would have been if the accident had happened in Europe. It was also held that there was a common intention shown to make a contract on the terms of the broker's slip, which asked for a policy excepting war risks, and that if the policy did not carry out these terms it ought to be rectified.

In another case, Coxe v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. [1916] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 629, a policy insured an army officer against death caused accidentally within the Kingdom, but contained a provision that it did "not insure against death or disablement, directly or indirectly caused by, arising from, or traceable to . . . war," and it appeared that after the outbreak of war the insured was assigned to protect a certain railway in England by means of guards; that it was his duty to visit the guards at night, and that it was necessary for him in doing so to walk alongside the rails; that while he was doing this he was accidentally struck by an engine and killed; that the general public had no right to walk where the accident occurred; that in normal times the spot was illuminated, but at the time of the accident the lights were obscured, in compliance with the Defense of the Realm Act. The court held that by the words "directly or indirectly" the maxim "causa proxima non remota spectatur" was excluded, and that a more remote link in the chain of causation was contemplated than the proximate and immediate cause, and held that the arbitrator's finding upon the facts that the insured's death was indirectly caused by war should be sustained. The court said: "The words in the condition 'caused by' and 'arising from' do not give rise to any difficulty. They are words which always have been construed as relating to the proximate cause. I am not sure whether the words 'traceable to' would of themselves necessarily go any further. They are very vague words, and I should have been disposed to hold, if those were the only words, that, if the defendants choose to employ very vague words of that kind, the words must be read strictly against them and in accordance with the ordinary maxim. But the words which I find it impossible to escape from are 'directly and indirectly.' There does not appear to be any authority in which those words have been considered, and I find it impossible to reconcile them with the maxim 'causa proxima non remota spectatur.' If it were contended that the result of the words is that the proximate cause, whether direct or indirect, is to be looked at, I should reply that that result does not appear to me to be consistent or intelligible. I am unable to understand what is an indirect proximate cause, and in my judgment the only possible effect which can be given to those words is that the maxim 'causa proxima non remota spectatur' is excluded, and that a more remote link in the chain of causation is contemplated than the proximate and immediate cause. But a line must be drawn somewhere. For instance, the birth of Captain Ewing, even though it may be said to have led in the chain of causation to his being in the position in which he was killed, could not be considered as causing his death; and if on the facts it was possible to hold, in accordance with the principles I have enunciated, that the clause was not applicable, I should have been able to find that his representatives had a claim. But I am unable to hold that any principle excludes, upon these facts, a possible finding by the arbitrator that war was the indirect cause of this accident. If war had merely placed Captain Ewing in a position not specially exposed to any danger, and in that position a particular incident not connected with war caused his death, I think that most probably in that case the matter would not come within the condition. For instance, suppose that, in connection with the war, the assured had gone to a military camp not in any way specially exposed to lightning, but where lightning had struck and killed him; I should be disposed to think that the war was so remote from the death that in that case it could not be said that the death was indirectly caused by the war. If, however, the war had placed the assured in a position specially exposed to danger, as, for instance, in a place where he was specially exposed to being struck by lightning,—if such a place can be conceived,—and he was there struck and killed by lightning, it appears to me to be a question of fact, not of construction, whether the death was indirectly caused by war. In the present case the arbitrator has found, as a fact, that the assured's death was indirectly traceable to war; and it is clear upon the facts that he was placed in a position of special danger; namely, he had to be about the railway line, performing his military duties, at night, with the lights turned down, in consequence of war, and while doing his military duties in that position of special danger he was killed by reason of the special danger which prevails at that particular place, and to which he was exposed by reason of his military duties. In those circumstances I am unable to hold that the arbitrator could not reasonably find, as a matter of fact, that the death was indirectly caused by war."

The case of Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1887) 65 Mich. 545, 8 Am. St. Rep. 913, 32 N. W. 812, is not directly within the scope of this note, but may be of some value in this connection. The accident policy in that case excluded liability in case of death while the insured was engaged in, or in consequence of, any unlawful act, and also provided that it should not cover death unless it was established by direct and positive proof that the death was not the result of design, either of the insured or any other person. It appeared that the insured was a deserter from the Army, and that while in a house of ill fame, upon opening a door, was shot by an officer who sought to arrest him, and there was evidence that the officer did not know that he was the man he wanted. It was held that the "design" intended by the policy was a design which intended the actual result accomplished, and not the design of the act itself, which act resulted in the killing of one contrary to the design of the act, and that if, when the officer fired, he did not know that the man he fired at was the insured, and did not intend to kill him, it could not be said that the insured lost his life by the design of the officer. It was also held in this case that it could not be held as a matter of law that the insured was engaged in an unlawful act within the meaning of the policy. The court said: "If he had been shot in the act of deserting, this claim might be made with some reason and propriety, but such was not the case here. Neither was he shot because he was a deserter, nor because he was in a house of ill fame. He was shot, if Berry is to be believed, because he did not throw up his hands when commanded to, and was in the act of drawing a pistol. He was killed, if Branagan is to be believed, without provocation, and in a wanton and murderous manner, as soon as his head appeared in the door. Whether he was doing anything unlawful at the time of the shooting was also a question for the jury, to be determined by them under all the circumstances of the case. If, on being refused admittance after rapping on the door, the officer had fired through the door, and killed Utter, it could not be claimed that Utter was killed by design, or because he was engaged in any unlawful act; nor if Berry fired at the first head he saw poked out of the door, not knowing or caring who it was, can it be held that the death was by design against Utter, or in consequence of any unlawful act on his part."

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

M. M. NORTON, Appt.,

v.

C. E. HEFNER and Wife.

Physician — liability for negligence of interne.

A surgeon is not liable for the negligence of an interne in the hospital in which he has performed an operation in looking after the dressing of the wound if he was not negligent in the selection of the interne who should perform that duty.

For other cases, see Physicians and Surgeons, II. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(October 15, 1917.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Crittenden County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for injuries resulting from improper treatment by another physician after the performance of a surgical operation by defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James R. Yerger for appellant.

Messrs. Rhoton & Helm and Berry & Wheeler for appellees.

McCulloch, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, M. M. Norton, is a physician and surgeon, and this is an action instituted against him by the plaintiff C. E. Hefner and his wife, Theresa, to recover damages on account of injuries resulting from improper treatment following a surgical operation performed by the defendant. It is not claimed that there was any unskillfulness or negligence in the performance of the surgical operation; but the contention is that the injury resulted from inattention or unskillfulness on the part of another physician left in charge of the patient by Dr. Norton after the operation was complete. There was a jury trial, which resulted in a verdict in favor of each of the plaintiffs. The material facts necessary to consider in disposing of the case here are as follows:

The defendant is a physician and surgeon, and was engaged in the practice of his profession at Lake Village, Arkansas. The plaintiffs resided at Marianna, Arkansas, and Mrs. Hefner was afflicted in a way that required a surgical operation involving an incision and entrance into the abdominal cavity. The plaintiffs met a young medical student, named Curran, with whom they were acquainted, and he recommended the employment of Dr. Norton to perform the operation. There is no evidence, however, that there was any business relation existing between Curran and Dr. Norton; but the former was merely a volunteer in recommending the latter as a suitable surgeon to perform the operation. He talked with Dr. Norton over the telephone, and made the arrangements for the latter to come to Little Rock and perform the operation at a hospital in this city. The plaintiffs came to Little Rock, and Mrs. Hefner was placed in the hospital, and Dr. Norton performed the operation with entire success, according to the testimony. Another surgeon of recognized ability in Little Rock was present and witnessed the operation, and there is no question made that it was not skilfully performed. There was also present another young physician, who was then an interne in the hospital. In finishing up the operation it became necessary to leave a piece or pieces of gauze in the wound for draining purposes, and this was done. After the operation had been completed, Dr. Norton announced that he could not remain in Little Rock any longer, but would have to return to his home at Lake Village, and the question arose between the parties as to who should look after the patient and dress the wound. There was testimony adduced by the plaintiff which tended to show that Dr. Norton arranged with a young physician, who was acting as interne in the hospital, to look after the patient until she recovered, and the recovery in this case was based entirely on the theory that the interne was guilty of negligence in failing to remove the gauze at the proper time, and that Dr. Norton was liable in damages because of the alleged negligence of the interne. The court, over the objection of the defendant, instructed the jury, in substance, that if Dr. Norton employed the interne to take charge of the patient for the purpose of dressing the wound and removing the gauze at the proper time, and the interne was guilty of negligence in failing to properly remove the gauze, the defendant would be liable, and that it was wholly immaterial whether the defendant paid or agreed to pay the interne for his services. There was no testimony in the case that Dr. Norton employed the interne, in the sense that he was to pay him anything for his services; but the evidence merely tends to show that the interne, at the request of Dr. Norton, agreed to take care of the patient. According to the undisputed evidence Dr. Norton left Little Rock shortly after the operation was completed, and did not see the patient any more; nor is there any testimony tending to show that Dr. Norton was guilty of any negligence in the selection of the interne as a proper person to look after the patient and remove the gauze. The interne was a physician who had been selected by the hospital management to attend patients in the hospital, and there was nothing to indicate that he was lacking in qualification for the position.

The evidence adduced and the instructions of the court present squarely the question whether or not a physician is liable in damages on account of negligence of another physician who takes charge of a patient at his request. That question seems to have been settled against the right to recover under those circumstances by a decision of L.R.A.1918C.

this court in the case of Keller v. Lewis, 65 Ark. 578, 47 S. W. 755. The facts of that case were that the son of the plaintiff sustained a dislocation of one of the joints in his arm and was taken to Dr. Keller, the defendant, for treatment. Keller was about to leave the city, but gave the dislocated arm temporary treatment, and recommended that the patient be taken to another physician, with whom Dr. Keller had arranged to look after his patients in his absence. One of the theories in the case was that the other physician was guilty of negligence in failing to treat the dislocated joint at the proper time, and the defendant asked the court to give an instruction telling the jury that the defendant could not be held liable for the negligence or want of skill of the other physician. The court refused to give the instruction and this court reversed the judgment on that account. In disposing of the case this court said: "The employment of Dr. Minor constituted an independent contract, and Dr. Keller is not responsible for his negligence or want of skill." The court cited in support of the opinion the case of Myers v. Holborn, 58 N. J. L. 193, 30 L.R.A. 345, 55 Am. St. Rep. 606, 38 Atl. 369, where, under somewhat similar circumstances, the New Jersey court held that "a party employing a person who follows a distinct and independent occupation of his own is not responsible for the negligent or improper acts of the other."

This view of the law is based upon the theory that the doctrine of respondeat superior applies only in case of the negligence of a servant who acts under the direction and control of the master (De Forrest v. Wright, 2 Mich. 368), and does not apply to a physician or other professional man, who, when employed, acts upon his own initiative and without direction from others. That idea was clearly expressed by this court in the case of Arkansas Midland R. Co. v. Pearson, 98 Ark. 399, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 317, 135 S. W. 917, where it was said: "A physician cannot be regarded as an agent or servant in the usual sense of the term, since he is not, and necessarily cannot be, directed in the diagnosing of diseases and injuries and prescribing treatment therefor; his office being to exercise his best skill and judgment in such matters, without control from those by whom he is called or his fees are paid."

Applying that principle to the case in hand, it is clear that the instructions of the court as to liability on the part of the defendant were erroneous. Appellant was not guilty of negligence in the performance of the operation, nor in the selection of a physician to continue the treatment after he left the city. Not being negligent in those respects, he cannot be held responsible for the negligence of the other physician, who was left in charge, merely because the other physician took charge on his suggestion and arrangement.

There was testimony adduced tending to establish an express agreement on appellant's part to look after the treatment in connection with the other physician, who was left in charge of the patient, and to make himself responsible for the latter's conduct and treatment of the patient; but the instructions given by the court do not make appellees' right of recovery depend on the existence of such contract.

Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

Annotation—Liability of operating surgeon for negligent act of interne or hospital nurse caring for patient.

Earlier cases which have considered the question under annotation will be found in the note to Harris v. Fall, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1174.

As to liability of physician or surgeon for acts of associate, see the note to Morey v. Thybo, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 785.

As to liability of physician or surgeon where foreign material is left in incision, see the note to Davis v. Kerr, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 611.

As to liability of proprietor of private sanitarium or hospital for negligence of nurse or attendant, see the notes to Stanley v. Schumpert, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 306, and Broz v. Omaha Maternity & General Hospital Asso. L.R.A.1915D, 334.

Harris v. Fall, to which the earlier note is attached, is cited with special approval in Hunner v. Stevenson (1913) 122 Md. 40, 89 Atl. 418, which held that an operating physician should not be held responsible for the negligence, if any, of a hospital physician, nurse, or interne in the dressing of wounds after the operation was performed, where he did not know of or was not privy to such negligence, and it was not discoverable by him in the exercise of ordinary care. The court stated that "at this day, when it is well known that there are physicians and surgeons of special skill in particular branches of their profession, it could not safely be announced as a general rule of law, applicable to such cases as this, that a surgeon who performs an operation is liable for the negligence of other physicians, nurses, or internes in hospitals in the after treatment, unless he specially undertakes such employment. A surgeon may be called many miles from his residence to perform an operation, and if he is to be held responsible for the negligence of others after the operation it might mean either that one of special skill would refuse to perform such operation at such distant points, or that his charges would be such that no one of moderate means could employ him. It might be detrimental to the L.R.A.1918C.

public if such a surgeon was required to attend to the after treatment, as it would be impossible for him to do so, and perform as many operations as some of them do."

So a surgeon is not responsible for the negligence of a hospital nurse in leaving a hot water bottle in the patient's bed, by which the patient, after an operation, is burned, where for the services of such nurse the patient pays the hospital and the surgeon is under no duty to supervise her work, and would not be permitted to do so. Stewart v. Manasses (1914) 244 Pa. 221, 90 Atl. 574.

And see, to the same effect, Morrison v. Henke (1916) 165 Wis. 166, 160 N. W. 173.

And where a patient in a hospital is treated by a physician who does not manage or control the hospital, the physician is not, if he had no connection with the negligent act, liable for the negligence of the hospital nurses or internes in permitting the patient to obtain access to poison, nor for their negligent failure to administer proper remedies and antidotes. Broz v. Omaha Maternity & General Hospital Asso. (1914) 96 Neb. 648, L.R.A.1915D, 334, 148 S. W. 575, 7 N. C. C. A. 298.

While, as will be seen from the foregoing cases, the general rule is that a physician or surgeon is not liable for the negligence of a nurse or interne in the after treatment of a patient, there is a difference of opinion as to the liability of a physician for the failure of a nurse to properly account for all the instruments or materials used during an operation, as a result of which such instrument or material is left in the incision. The weight of opinion is that in such a case the physician or surgeon cannot escape liability.

Thus, a surgeon who leaves a sponge in an abdominal incision after an operation cannot escape liability for the resulting injury, notwithstanding he relied upon the count made by the attending nurses, unless it was so concealed that reasonable care on his part would not have disclosed it, or conditions were such that in his professional judgment further exploration for sponges would have endangered the safety of the patient. Davis v. Kerr (1913) 239 Pa. 351, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 611, 86 Atl. 1007.

Nor can a surgeon relieve himself from liability for injury to a patient in leaving a sponge in the wound after an operation, by the adoption of a rule requiring the attending nurse to count the sponges used and removed, and relying upon such count as conclusive that all sponges have been accounted for. Ibid.

And see Palmer v. Humiston (1913) 87 Ohio St. 401, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 640, 101 N. E. 283, which is to the effect that a nurse's count will not relieve a surgeon from liability for failure to remove sponges used in an operation.

To the same effect is Barnett v. Brand (1915) 165 Ky. 616, 177 S. W. 461. In this latter case, however, although the attending nurse was a trained nurse obtained from a hospital, the operation was performed at the patient's home, and not at the hospital.

In an action against a physician for negligence in leaving a rubber tube in a patient's body after an operation, it is no answer that such tube may have been left by a nurse or a resident physician. Saucier v. Ross (1916) 112 Miss. 306, 73 So. 49.

On the other hand, in Jewison v. Hasard (1916) — Manitoba, —, 28 D. L. R. 584, a surgeon was held not to be responsible for the negligence of a nurse furnished by the hospital in making count of the number of sponges used in an operation, as a result of which one was sewed up in the body. The court stated that in such cases the surgeon is necessarily too busy with his other work to keep count of the sponges, and that the duty of so doing is properly delegated to the nurse in order to enable him to give his whole attention to his work.

In Niebel v. Winslow (1915) 88 N. J. L. 191, 95 Atl. 995, an action for damages for negligence in performance of an operation, it was held error for the court to give an instruction that "if you find that the gauze was left in the abdomen of the plaintiff and the incision sewed up or allowed to heal up over it, the burden of proof is on the defendant to show that it was not left there by any carelessness or negligence of his." The court stated that "the practically injurious nature of the request will at once be apparent when it is remembered that in the present case the operation, although performed by the defendant, a private practitioner, was performed by him in a hospital, where he was assisted by trained resident nurses, presumably in the employ of the hospital and familiar with their duties. While the testimony is meager as to the precise nature of these duties, it is inferable from the evidence and from the terms 'operator' and 'assistant' that it was the duty of the latter at or just before the close of the operation to count the sponges in use, which at that critical stage the operator himself could not do without jeopardy to his patient." It would appear from the above statement that the court inclined to the view that the physician had a right to rely upon the count made by the nurse, and that he would not be liable for any negligence on the part of the nurse in making the count. APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Superior Court for Suffolk County dismissing a bill filed to enjoin defendant from interfering with the conduct of plaintiffs' business. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Arthur Williams and Henry F. Wood for appellants.

Messrs. John C. Hammond and Thomas J. Hammond for appellees.

Rugg, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity in which six plaintiffs join in alleging that they are merchants having permanent places of business, five of them in Boston and one in Springfield, and that occasionally at various times during the year they hire rooms in a hotel in Northampton and there display goods and merchandise as samples, making no sales from that stock, but taking orders at retail for future delivery from their places of business in Boston or Springfield. The defendant is chief of police of Northampton, who asserts that the plaintiffs have no right to conduct business in this manner without licenses, and threatens to institute complaints against them for violation of Rev. Laws, chap. 65, § 13. See Stat. 1916, chap. 242, whereby hawking and peddling and selling by itinerant vendors in general, with some exceptions, are prohibited. The prayers of the bill are that the defendant be forever enjoined from arresting their agents or otherwise interfering with the conduct of their business, and that the question whether they were violating the statute be determined. The defendant demurred upon several grounds. As he has not raised the point that the plaintiffs cannot join in such a suit, that is passed by. Stevens v. Rockport Granite Co. 216 Mass. 486, 493, 104 N. E. 371, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1054.

The plaintiffs do not allege nor argue that the statute under which they aver that the defendant proposes to prosecute them is unconstitutional on any ground, nor that its enforcement as to them would be an unlawful interference with interstate commerce. Their simple contention is that their conduct as set forth in their bill is not a violation of the statute rightly construed.

It is the general rule that the prosecution and punishment of crimes will not be restrained by a court of chancery. But L.R.A.1918C.

there is an exception to this comprehensive statement. Jurisdiction in equity to restrain the institution of prosecutions under unconstitutional or void statutes or local ordinances has been upheld by this court when property rights would be injured irreparably, and when other elements necessary to support cognizance by equity are present. Greene v. Fitchburg, 219 Mass. 121, 127, 106 N. E. 573; Moneyweight Scale Co. v. McBride, 199 Mass. 503, 506, 85 N. E. 870. The statement of the law in England has been made rather broadly that there is no jurisdiction in equity (at all events since the abolition of the court of the Star Chamber, which exercised a jurisdiction of so-called criminal equity) to enjoin prosecution for crime. Saull v. Browne, L. R. 10 Ch. 64, 44 L. J. Ch. N. S. 1, 31 L. T. N. S. 493, 23 Week. Rep. 50, 13 Cox, C. C. 30; Kerr v. Preston Corp. L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 463, 466, 46 L. J. Ch. N. S. 409, 25 Week. Rep. 264. See also Grand Junction Waterworks Co. v. Hampton Urban Dist. Council [1898] 2 Ch. 381, 341, 67 L. J. Ch. N. S. 603, 62 J. P. 566, 78 L. T. N. S. 673, 14 Times L. R. 467, 46 Week. But there seems to be a caution about saying that circumstances may not arise authorizing a close approach to such jurisdiction. Aukland v. Westminster Local Bd. of Works, L. R. 7 Ch. 597, 41 L. J. Ch. N. S. 723, 26 L. T. N. S. 961, 20 Week. Rep. 845, 16 Eng. Rul. Cas. 489; Burghes v. Atty. Gen. [1911] 2 Ch. 139, 156, 157, 80 L. J. Ch. N. S. 506, 105 L. T. N. S. 193, 27 Times L. R. 433, 55 So. Jo. 520. It was said in Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33, 37, 38, 60 L. ed. 131, 133, 134, L.R.A.1916D, 545, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 7, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 283: "It is also settled that, while a court of equity, generally speaking, has 'no jurisdiction over the prosecution, the punishment or the pardon of crimes or misdemeanors' (Re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 200, 210, 31 L. ed. 402, 405, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 482), a distinction obtains, and equitable jurisdiction exists to restrain criminal prosecutions under unconstitutional enactments, when the prevention of such prosecutions is essential to the safeguarding of rights of property."

See Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, 223 U. S. 605, 621, 56 L. ed. 570, 577, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 340.

That is the law of this commonwealth. Doubtless that principle is generally recognized by the courts of this country. It has been applied to the institution of proceedings under statutes and ordinances, the enforcement of which would result in unlawful deprivation of the right to labor (Truax

v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33, 60 L. ed. 131, L.R.A. 1916D, 545, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 7, Ann. Rep. 633; Jewell Tea Co. v. Carthage, 257 Mo. 383, 391, 165 S. W. 743); the confiscation of property or property rights (Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 241, 49 L. ed. 169, 177, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 18; Home Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Los Angeles, 227 U. S. 278, 293, 57 L. ed. 510, 517, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 312); the denial of due process of law (Hopkins v. Clemson Agri. College, 221 U. S. 636, 55 L. ed. 890, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 243, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 654); and the denial of the equal protection of the laws (Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 146, 147, 52 L. ed. 714, 723, 724, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 932, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 441, 14 Ann. Cas. 764).

The jurisdiction in chancery thus recognized and exercised rests upon the fundamental and well-established equitable doctrine that private personal and property rights will be protected by injunction from threatened irreparable unlawful injury. The injunction against the institution of criminal proceedings is simply incidental to that main ground of equitable jurisdiction. Where the facts are such as to call for the exercise of the powers of a court of chancery according to its established principles, the mere fact that, in order to grant the remedy afforded by equity, it may be necessary as a subsidiary step to enjoin the institution of criminal proceeding or even the commission of a crime, is no bar to the jurisdiction of equity. That this is the underlying principle is manifest not only from an examination of the cases above cited, but of most cases where the injunction has been granted or jurisdiction assumed.<sup>1</sup> This is but another way of stating the principle that while as a general rule equity will not interfere by injunction with the prosecution of crimes, there is an exception where such prosecutions are founded on unconstitutional or void enactments and will result in immediate injury to property or property rights.

Some courts of equity have taken jurisdiction of causes on the ground of prevention of multiplicity of prosecutions, sometimes in combination with the circumstance that there was no relief by appeal. Franklin v. Lacey, 157 Ky. 261, 263, 162 S. W. 1126; Martin v. Baldy, 249 Pa. 253, 258, 94 Atl. 1091. It is possible that Huntworth v. Tanner, 87 Wash. 670, 152 Pac. 523, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 676, may stand on some such ground, although the discussion in that opinion goes much further than that in any other case of which we are aware. Other courts have taken jurisdiction because there was arbitrary, oppressive, and revengeful conduct amounting to a settled malicious purpose to cause irreparable damage to the property rights or personal liberty of the complainant by numerous or successive prosecutions. Cutsinger v. Atlanta, 142 Ga. 555, 573, 574, L.R.A.1915B, 1097, 83 S. E. 263, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 280; Alexander v. Elkins, 132 Tenn. 663, L.R.A. 1916C, 261, 179 S. W. 310; Baldwin v. Atlanta, 147 Ga. —, 92 S. E. 630. Without pausing to discuss or to consider the soundness of those principles, it is enough to say that there are no allegations to bring the case at bar within them. A possibility that complaints may be lodged against six persons is not enough under these circumstances to make out a case of multiplicity. The allegations as to repeated complaints are not sufficient to warrant the inference that the courts of this commonwealth will countenance continued and oppressive prosecutions when once a genuine test case open to fair question has been presented and is on its way to final decision.

The allegation of the bill in the case at bar is that, to determine the question whether they "come within the purview of the statutes," as contended by the defendant, "will take several months before a decision relative thereto can be had from the supreme court; that the said respondent has stated that he will arrest and prevent the complainants from exhibiting as aforesaid in said city of Northampton, even during the time a test case is awaiting a decision by the supreme court, unless the complainants are duly licensed forthwith by the said commissioner of weights and measures either as itinerant vendors or as hawkers and peddlers; that, by reason of the respondent's threats and arbitrary attitude relative thereto, the complaints would be prevented from carrying on their usual business as aforesaid in said city of Northampton while the said question would be pending before the supreme court; and that the complainants would thereby sustain irreparable damage in that the seasons for exhibitions and sales by sample for future delivery as advertised will have passed, in that the profits therefrom would be wholly lost, and in that the complainants would be compelled at considerable expense to cancel reservations of accommodations heretofore made in said city of Northampton, and would otherwise be greatly damaged." This allegation is to a considerable extent respecting the course of law and proceedings in court in this commonwealth, and hence is not admitted by the demurrer. It assumes that, although plainly innocent of any infraction of the law, the plaintiffs will be found guilty by the district court and by the superior court, a presumption which as matter of law cannot be indulged, at least upon such general allegations.

The allegations as to property damage are nothing more than the ordinary averments which might be made by anybody engaged in business, undertaking a branch of commercial adventure believed by the officers charged with enforcing the law to be in contravention of some penal statute confessedly valid in itself. Simply that one is in business, and may be injured in respect of his business by prosecution for an alleged crime, is no sufficient reason for asking a court of equity to ascertain in advance whether the business as conducted is in violation of a penal statute.

The conclusion is that the allegations of the bill do not make out a cause for equitable relief, but fall within the general principle that courts of equity will not enjoin the institution of proceedings to punish alleged crimes. While there is some diversity in the application of the governing principles, this result appears to be in harmony with most of the decisions already cited, and is supported by the great weight of authority.<sup>2</sup>

Messrs. S. P. Freeling, Attorney General, and John B. Harrison, Assistant Attorney General, for appellees:

The reasonableness of the rates fixed must depend upon the dominant fact whether they are so low as to deprive defendant of a reasonable income from its investments, which fact is to be determined from the actual fair value of the property used in the service, together with the actual and reasonable cost of using such property in such service.

Kane, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order of the Corporation Commission fixing a schedule of rates to be charged by the Pioneer Telephone & Telegraph Company for exchange service in the city of Ada. At the time the complaint herein was filed the telephone company was charging for exchange service at Ada the following rates per month:

For business single line .....	$2 50
For business extension line .....	1 00
For PBX sets, per line .....	1 00
For residence single line .....	1 50
For residence two-party line .....	1 25
For residence extension sets .....	50

The complainant alleged that these rates were unreasonable, and prayed the Corporation Commission to reduce them to an equitable basis. The answer of the defendants specifically denied that the rates charged for exchange service in the city of Ada were unreasonable, and alleged that, on the contrary, said rates were inadequate to insure the company a fair return upon the reasonable value of its property used for the purpose of giving such service. Wherefore it prayed to be permitted to increase its exchange rates in the city of Ada to $2.50 per month for single line business telephones, $2 per month for single line residence telephones, and $1.50 per month for two-party line residence telephones. After very full hearings, held at several convenient points in the state, the Corporation Commission promulgated an order fixing the rates to be charged per month as follows:

For business single line phone .....	$2 00
For business extension line .....	1 00
For business PBX line .....	1 00
For residence single line .....	1 00
For residence two-party line .....	75
For residence extension line .....	50

This order is the one here for review in this proceeding. The evidence adduced at the trial on behalf of the complainant consisted of certain statistical exhibits prepared by the company and filed with the Corporation Commission for its information, which purport to cover all details of the operation of the telephone exchange of the defendant in the city of Ada, including the value of its entire system, and the comparative value of its property used in the public service at Ada, and the relation between the business of the Ada exchange and that of the telephone company as a whole. Mr. George P. Player, the telephone expert and engineer of the Corporation Commission, explained these statistical exhibits, and drew certain expert deductions therefrom as to the valuation of the defendant's property, the proportion thereof that was employed for the public service at Ada, and the returns thereon received by the company. The evidence offered in behalf of the company consisted of tabulated statements prepared by the company for this particular case, which purported to constitute a complete inventory of its property connected with its exchange at Ada; also all property in or immediately connected with the Ada exchange that was used in connection with the toll plant, separating in the schedule the property that was used for toll purposes from that used for exchange purposes. These tabulated statements were supplemented by deductions drawn therefrom by the company's experts and engineers. All of these statements introduced in evidence by the respective parties and the oral evidence of the experts in relation thereto, together with the elaborate findings and conclusions of the Corporation Commission, are set out in full in the briefs, and, with arguments of counsel, make two quite pretentious volumes of 353 and 110 pages, respectively, of printed matter. From a careful study of this mass of learning and expert opinion on the subject of telephony and rate regulation we gather that there is no difference of opinion between counsel for the respective parties as to the right of the telephone using inhabitants of Ada to have a reasonable rate fixed by the telephone company for exchange service at that point, or that, on the other hand, the company is entitled to demand for such service a fair return upon the reasonable value of its property as a producing factor at the time it is being used by the public. Both parties also seem to recognize the practical necessity for establishing and maintaining level rates for exchange service.

The parties being in accord as to these points, we will confine ourselves as nearly as may be to the specific elements considered by the Commission in fixing the valuation of the plant which counsel contend are erroneous. The Corporation Commission, it appears, proceeded upon the theory that to the value of the property devoted to the giving of exchange service at Ada should be added a proportionate part of the entire value of the property of the defendant devoted to the furnishing of long-distance or toll service in the entire state; in other words, that the total value of the property devoted purely to exchange service, and a proportionate part of the value of the property devoted to the giving of long-distance or toll service, would be the amount upon which the company was entitled to returns for the furnishing of exchange service, and that to the revenues from exchange service at Ada should be added all revenues derived from toll service in and out of that city. The reason given by the Commission for this basis of apportionment is that, inasmuch as the company owns and operates as a whole all of the exchanges and its toll plants within the state, and the revenues accruing from both classes of service are placed to the credit of the company, and all expenses incident to the maintenance and operation of both toll and exchange plants are paid out of such revenues, the toll and exchange properties of the company should be regarded as inseparable factors or elements in the general property, both making a single industrial and commercial entity. Upon this point the contention of counsel for the company is that in passing upon the reasonableness of the exchange rates the value of the property devoted to the giving of exchange service should be separated from the value of the property devoted to giving toll or any other service at Ada, and that in considering this value of the Ada exchange plant no additions should be made thereto on account of the toll property within the Ada exchange, or anywhere else in the state.

Generally, in fixing rates for a telephone company engaged in furnishing services throughout the state, regard must be had at the outset for the value of the property of the company as a whole. If the return on the value of the property as a whole is found to be reasonable, it then becomes necessary to determine whether the rate classifications are proper and reasonable as between the various classes of users and the different communities or municipal units served within the state. This for the reason that it is desirable that rates as a whole be made uniform and reasonable as between individuals and communities of the same class. Whilst it may be difficult to fix rates for any particular exchange based upon the actual investment in that exchange at any given time, it is conceivable that in the process of general rate making the inhabitants of one of the municipal units connected with the service system as a whole may be unreasonably discriminated against. This, we understand, it is alleged is the situation at Ada. It is merely the rate for exchange service at Ada that is alleged to be unreasonable, and the question is, What elements should be considered in ascertaining the value of the plant for the adjustment of this rate, if found to be unreasonable? Generally, when rates for a specific service are in controversy, there must be assigned to each business carried on by the public service corporation that proportion of the total value of the property which will correspond to the extent of its employment in that business. Minnesota Rate Cases (Simpson v. Shepard) 230 U. S. 352, 57 L. ed. 1511, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1151, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 729, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 18. The rule as applicable to telephone companies is frequently found stated somewhat as follows: In order that local exchange rates may be reasonably adjusted, it is desirable that as far as possible they shall not be entangled with the cost of the long-distance service, and therefore the valuation of the toll plant should be separated from the valuation of the exchange plant as far as practicable. Report of B. C. and William B. Jackson, experts to the Massachusetts Highway Commission, 17 Mass. H. C. R. 2 R. 11; Re Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 11 N. C. C. C. 243; Re Interurban Teleph. Co. 6 Wis. R. C. 647. Such a separation of investment and revenue and expense accounts is required by the Interstate Commerce Commission by rule as follows:

"Accounts should show fixed capital, operating revenues, and operating expenses pertaining solely to any exchange or toll system or common to two or more systems.

... (a) Telephone companies should keep their fixed capital accounts in such manner as will enable them to show, when so required by the Commission, (1) the cost of fixed capital devoted solely to any exchange system, (2) the cost of fixed capital devoted solely to any toll system, and (3) the cost of fixed capital used in common by two or more exchange or toll systems.

"(b) The classification of operating revenues provides separate accounts for exchange revenue and for toll revenue. Where it is necessary to apportion the revenue between these accounts telephone companies should be prepared, when so required by the Commission, to furnish the basis used in making such apportionment.

"(c) Telephone companies should keep their operating expense accounts in such manner as will permit them to show, when so required by the Commission, (1) the operating expenses pertaining solely to any exchange system, (2) the operating expenses pertaining solely to any toll system, and (3) the operating expenses which are common to two or more exchange or toll systems."

We therefore conclude that where, as in the case at bar, it is charged that the exchange rates of a single municipality are unreasonable, the Corporation Commission in finding a basis for the adjustment of such rates should, as far as practicable, separate the valuation of the toll plant from the value of the exchange plant and equitably apportion between them the value of the property used in common in giving both L.R.A.1918C.

classes of service. But by this we do not wish to be understood as approving the conclusion reached by the company, its counsel and experts, as to the comparative value of the property used in common for both classes of service. In apportioning toll line property to the Ada plant they adopt as a basis for apportioning the value of the property used in common the comparative use made of the common switchboard. This switchboard consists of seven sections, three of which are devoted to caring for exchange, and four for toll line business. By this process they find three sevenths of the property of the Ada plant to be chargeable to exchange business, and four sevenths to the toll business. This, the Commission correctly finds, is a purely arbitrary basis for apportionment. It seems to us that the values of the property used in common should be, as far as practicable, apportioned between the exchange service and toll service on actual service requirements, and the cause will be remanded to the Commission for re-examination on this point for the purpose of making findings and conclusions upon this basis.

Another ground for complaint is based upon the claim that the Corporation Commission refused to allow the company a sufficient reserve for depreciation. The Commission held that, inasmuch as the evidence showed that the physical plant was kept up to a high degree of efficiency by replacements paid for out of current revenue, and that any deterioration covered by obsolescence would not affect the result in the case at bar, there was no depreciation, and therefore an allowance for a reserve fund to take care of depreciation was not necessary, and should not be allowed. The contention of the company on this point is that, notwithstanding every part of a properly constructed and well-equipped telephone system may be maintained in good condition from year to year out of the maintenance fund, yet the time inevitably comes with every building and unit of equipment when it can no longer be kept serviceable by repairs or current maintenance, and when it must be replaced substantially in its entirety. Therefore, they say, since the total life expectancy of the parts of the entire plant may be measured in years on something similar to a mortality table basis, unless a depreciation fund is provided for from year to year out of earnings, sufficient to replace the plant substantially in its entirety at the end of each life expectancy period, the dividends paid will before long represent the better part of the stockholders' investment. A great many authorities and opinions of experts are cited by counsel for the company which they say conclusively show the economic necessity for the principle contended for, among which are the following: Pioneer Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Westenhaber, 29 Okla. 429, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1209, 118 Pac. 354; State Journal Printing Co. v. Madison Gas & E. Co. 4 Wis. R. C. 501; Re Cumberland Municipal Electric Lighting Plant, 4 Wis. R. C. 214; Cunningham v. Chippewa Falls Water & Lighting Co. 5 Wis. R. C. 302; Puget Sound Electric R. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 65 Wash. 75, 117 Pac. 739, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 763; People ex rel. Manhattan R. Co. v. Woodbury, 203 N. Y. 231, 96 N. E. 420; People ex rel. Third Ave. R. Co. v. State Tax Comrs. 136 App. Div. 155, 120 N. Y. Supp. 528.

The expert opinion relied upon consists of an article by Mr. William B. Jackson, entitled "Depreciation and Reserve Funds of Electrical Properties," published in the Electrical Review of May 7, 1910, page 934, the report of William J. Hagenah in his Investigation of the Chicago Telephone Company, 1910, and in the second volume of Telephony, page 102. After examining such of these authorities as are available to us, and others on the same subject not cited, we find ourselves unable to agree with counsel in their assumption that the doctrine of depreciation, as contended for by them, meets with the universal approval of the courts and the economists. From our investigation of the problem of depreciation we are convinced that precedent on this question is varying, and that there is also great contrariety of opinion among the heads of public service corporations themselves, some companies believing that their best interests lie in adopting the largest possible depreciation charge and in the consequent accumulation of a permanent fund in the future, whilst others contend that the application of the doctrine amounts to a virtual confiscation of their property. Without attempting to set out herein our analysis of these discordant views, it is sufficient to say that we have reached the conclusion that in plants of considerable size that have attained their gait, to which class the plant herein is conceded to belong, there is both theoretically and actually a normal condition in which the replacements come along with comparative evenness, and where there can be no possible use for a so-called depreciation fund of any considerable amount.

In the case at bar, as we have seen, the Commission made no deduction from the value of the plant on account of depreciation, but allowed returns upon its value as a going concern, kept up to a high degree of efficiency by replacements paid for out of current revenue. There is no principle L.R.A.1918C.

of public regulation more firmly established than the right of the company to charge in its rate an amount which will enable it to make these replacements, and, as investors put their money into public utilities for the sake of the returns they will be able to obtain, if the allowance for replacements is sufficient to keep up a high degree of efficiency and prevent a lowering of the ability of the plant to earn returns, we are unable to perceive the necessity for building up a fund to be used for the purpose of counteracting a purely theoretical depreciation. The theory of the Commission seems to be that charges should be made in rates sufficient to counteract or prevent depreciation by replacements, and that when replacements are thus fully provided for, depreciation is counteracted. We see no error in this; at least, none of which the appellant company has any just cause to complain.

Under the heading, "Going Value or Cost of Establishing Business," counsel for the telephone company in their brief say: "The Commission refused to allow anything to cover what is sometimes referred to as 'going value,' but more properly designated 'cost of establishing the business,' holding that, while the item had been referred to in Whorton's exhibit 'C,' where Mr. Whorton stated that the amount of $30,010 did not include going concern value, was the only reference in the record to the subject of going concern value as applied to the defendant's property in Ada; that if there is such an element of value in the plant in question, it would appear that the burden would rest upon the defendant corporation to show the amount thereof if the same is to be accepted as a legitimate factor in the valuation of investment upon which the defendant is entitled to earn."

If counsel mean by this that in addition to the actual value of the plant as a producing factor they are entitled to returns on a definite sum as the measure of going value, or that the record shows that the Corporation Commission did not consider the plant of the telephone company as a going concern in fixing the value thereof, we cannot agree with them. It is well settled, as we have seen, that what the company is entitled to demand in order that it may have just compensation is a fair return upon the reasonable value of its property used by it for the convenience of the public as a producing factor at the time it is being used. In rate-making cases the corporation whose rates are under consideration is always a going concern, and it is inconceivable to think of it in any other light. In such cases the term "going concern value" simply means the value of the plant as a whole upon which the company is entitled to a fair return, as distinguished from its bare physical value. We think there can be no doubt that the Corporation Commission found and fixed a valuation upon the property of the company as a going concern, as distinguished from its value as a mere naked plant. The Commission is not required—indeed, it would not be practicable—to set aside a definite sum as the measure of going value. As was said by Mr. Chief Justice Winslow in Appleton Water Co. v. Railroad Commission, 154 Wis. 121, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 770, 142 N. W. 476, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1160: "However, the fundamental difficulty with the attempt to set a definite sum as the measure of going value is that it is an attempt to divide a thing which is in its nature practically indivisible. The value of the plant and business is an indivisible gross amount; it is not obtained by adding up a number of separate items, but by taking a comprehensive view of each and all of the elements of property, tangible and intangible, including property rights, and considering them all, not as separate things, but as inseparable parts of one harmonious entity, and exercising the judgment as to the value of that entity."

We do not understand that the case of Pioneer Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Westenhaver, 29 Okla. 429, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1209, 118 Pac. 354, is an authority in favor of what seems to be counsel's contention, that the company is entitled to have a definite sum found as a going concern value. On the contrary, we think that case supports what we deem to be the true rule, that going value necessarily inheres in and constitutes an inseparable part of the entire structure as a going concern; that is, that the value of the plant, and the business as a producing factor, is an indivisible gross amount, and any attempt to fix a definite sum as the measure of going value would be an attempt to divide a thing which is in its nature practically indivisible.

The findings and conclusions of the Corporation Commission as to the reasonableness of the proportion of its returns paid by the plaintiff in error to the American Telephone & Telegraph Company seem to be supported by the evidence in the record as it now stands. Of this item, counsel for plaintiff in error say in their brief: "Since the trial of this case the Commission has tried two or three other rate cases wherein the validity of this payment was questioned by the Commission, and, in order to show fully and leave no doubt in the minds of that body as to the reasonableness and fairness of this payment, the defendant has introduced the evidence of its engineer, covering more than 120 pages of solid typewritten matter, going into the subject exhaustively and in detail, and in addition to this has introduced in evidence the entire record covering the inquiry of the Public Service Commission of Washington, the Public Service Commission of California, and the Railroad Commission of Oregon into the arrangement between the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Company and the American Telephone & Telegraph Company, with reference to the  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent of its gross receipts paid by the former to the latter. This record covers 696 pages of printed matter, tables, and statistics, and on account of the fact that the record in this case is not in condition to present the entire matter to the court fully, we respectfully recommend that it render no decision in this case as to the validity of this payment, as it would no doubt be a precedent, and the matter should not, in our judgment, be finally passed upon in this legislative matter until the court has possession of all relevant facts. The amount involved in the present case is so small that we do not believe it would change the result one way or the other, as we are entirely satisfied that if no sum whatever is allowed as a proper expense for the property and benefits received, the rates in force at the time the order was made should not have been reduced."

If this item is material to the adjustment of the exchange rate at Ada, application may be made to introduce the additional evidence above adverted to when the cause goes back to the Commission for re-examination, which, no doubt, will be sustained by the Commission if it finds such additional evidence to be material to the matter now under consideration. We believe the foregoing discussion covers all the points of difference between the parties necessary to a correct understanding and determination of all questions in dispute herein when the cause comes on for further investigation before the Commission.

Section 22, art. 9, Williams's Constitution, provides: "In no case of appeal from the Commission, shall any new or additional evidence be introduced in the supreme court. . . . The supreme court shall have jurisdiction, on such appeal, to consider and determine the reasonableness and justness of the action of the Commission appealed from, as well as any other matter arising under such appeal: Provided, however, that the action of the Commission appealed from shall be regarded as prima facie just, reasonable, and correct; but the court may, when it deems necessary, in the interest of justice, remand to the Commission any case pending on appeal, and require the same to be further investigated by the Commission, and reported upon to the court (together with a certificate of such additional evidence as may be tendered before the Commission by any party in interest), before the appeal is finally decided."

In view of the misconception of the Commission hereinbefore pointed out, the interest of justice requires the cause to be remanded to the Corporation Commission for further investigation, and to make findings of fact and conclusions of law based upon the theory herein outlined, and for the purpose of taking such additional evidence as may be deemed necessary by the Commission for a full and fair hearing of the question in controversy. It may be that the evidence now in the record is sufficient to enable the Corporation Commission to make findings and conclusions as to the value upon the basis herein approved. In that event, the only duty to be performed by the Commission will be to make findings and conclusions as to the specific points in controversy upon the approved basis outlined herein, and to return the same with the record.

It is true that counsel for the appellant in their brief and its experts at the trial, as we have seen, draw certain conclusions from the evidence as it stands as to the proper apportionment of exchange and toll property which if accepted would probably show the rate fixed to be unreasonable. The supreme court, however, in considering appeals from the Corporation Commission, is entitled to have before it a written statement, prepared by the Commission, of the reasons upon which the action appealed from is based. Williams's Const. art. 9, § 22. And these reasons, of course, ought to be predicated upon a correct understanding of the legal principles involved. Notwithstanding the Commission committed error in the respect hereinbefore pointed out as to the proper basis for ascertaining the value of the property of the telephone company used for the convenience of its exchange patrons at Ada, it does not follow that the rate fixed by it for that service may be found to be unreasonable when predicated upon the basis herein approved.

The record before us clearly shows that the rates adopted by the Commission were based upon a full investigation, which involved the exercise of judgment and discretion by the Commission. In these circumstances, the action of the Commission appealed from must be regarded as prima facie just, reasonable, and correct, until such time as the cause can be considered upon full hearing.

It is therefore ordered that this cause shall be remanded to the Corporation Commission for further investigation and report on the points herein indicated, and that the record be returned to this court, together with the certificate of such additional evidence as may be tendered before the Commission, within sixty days from the date of this order.

All the Justices concur, except Miley, J., disqualified and not participating.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF TULSA.

Appeal — effect of finding of fact.

1. Where there is evidence reasonably tending to support the finding of the jury, such finding will not be disturbed by this court on appeal.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, VII. 1, 2, a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Trial — impeaching verdict.

2. Affidavits or testimony of jurors will not be received for the purpose of impeach-ing the verdict which they have solemnly made and publicly returned into court.

For other cases, see New Trial, V. d, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — nonconcurring juror.

3. And the fact that the juror making the affidavit did not concur in the verdict returned does not change the rule, for the rule is based upon public policy, and is for the purpose of preventing litigants or the public from invading the privacy of the jury room, either during deliberations of the jury or afterwards. It is to prevent over-zealous litigants and a curious public from prying into deliberations which are intended to be, and should be, private, frank, and free discussions of the questions under consideration.

Brett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On October 17, 1908, James Egan drew two checks for the sum of $3,250 each upon the First National Bank of Tulsa, payable to Peter Deitchman and D. M. Martindale, respectively. A few days after the execution and delivery of these checks Egan contends that he notified the bank not to pay either of said checks, and that the bank stopped payment of the Deitchman check, but that, on the 19th day of October, 1909, the bank paid the Martindale check without his knowledge or consent; and in November, 1910, he instituted this suit against the bank to recover the amount of money thus paid by it upon said check. The bank denied that the payment of this check was ordered stopped, and contends that James Egan, after the bank had paid this check, ratified the act of the bank in paying the same, in that he continued to transact business with the bank, deposit money, draw checks thereon, and that he did not institute this suit until more than thirteen months after the check had been paid; while Egan contends that he did not know that this $3,250 check to Martindale had been paid until September, 1910.

The issues raised by the pleadings were presented to the jury under proper instructions of the court, and the jury decided adversely to Egan and in favor of the bank; and inasmuch as there is evidence here supporting both theories of the bank, that is, that the payment of the check was not ordered stopped, and that Egan had ratified the payment of the check by the bank, we L.R.A.1918C.

2. The most serious question raised in this case, and the only one requiring special attention, is whether or not a juror may impeach the verdict of the jury. Here there was a majority verdict, and two of the jurors who did not concur in the verdict returned made affidavits to the effect that the foreman of the jury, before a decision was reached, made the statement that "James Egan, the plaintiff, could have been shut out from testifying in the case; that he had been in prison and his statement was unworthy of belief."

The affidavits also state that certain other members of the jury made statements to the same effect. And plaintiff in error insists that these affidavits were admissible to impeach the verdict, and that the court erred in not granting a new trial on account of the facts stated in said affidavits.

We are aware that this presents a much vexed question. But we are of the opinion that the position maintained by the majority of the courts that a juror cannot impeach the verdict of the jury furnishes a surer foundation for justice and is supported by better reason than is found in those cases which attempt to make distinctions and furnish qualified conditions under which a juror may impeach the verdict of his jury.

As was well said by the late Judge Furman in Keith v. State, 7 Okla. Crim. Rep. 156, 123 Pac. 172: "If, after being discharged and mingling with the public, jurors are permitted to impeach verdicts which they have rendered, judgments based upon verdicts of juries would rest upon a very uncertain foundation. Litigants against whom verdicts have been rendered would be continually importuning jurors, and attempting to obtain from them affidavits upon which such verdicts could be assailed. This would result in perjury and bribery. There would be no end of litigation in cases tried before juries. Therefore, for the security of litigants, and to prevent fraud and perjury, as well as for the protection of the jurors themselves, courts will not allow jurors to impeach their own verdict, unless they are permitted to do so by the express provisions of the statute. We have no statute permitting this to be done."

In Saltzman v. Sunset Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 125 Cal. 501, 58 Pac. 169, it is said: "The independence of the jury and the value of their discussions would be lessened if the reasons given by any juror for his opinions or for his verdict could be reported to the court and criticized, and his motives impugned for remarks made in the jury room. And such reports would be more likely to be made by dissenting jurors who had been heated by earnest debate and defeated by the final vote. But the independence of the jury would be gone if a perfectly correct report could be made and the verdict attacked by showing that some jurors mistook the evidence or the law, or were actuated by other considerations. There would be no freedom of discussion in the jury room if they were subject to a possible censorship of this character. And the stability of judicial determinations would be as much imperiled by liability to attack by dissenting jurors as by the others. . . . The main reasons, I think, are these two: (1) That the jurors, who are practically the only witnesses in regard to the matter, may not be tampered with, and the verdicts by these means imperiled; and (2) to secure independence and freedom from improper restraint on the part of the jury."

In McDonald v. Pless, 238 U. S. 264, 59 L. ed. 1300, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 783, it is said:

"Let it once be established that verdicts solemnly made and publicly returned into court can be attacked and set aside on the testimony of those who took part in their publication, and all verdicts could be, and many would be, followed by an inquiry in the hope of discovering something which might invalidate the finding. Jurors would be harassed and beset by the defeated party in an effort to secure from them evidence of facts which might establish misconduct sufficient to set aside a verdict. If evidence thus secured could be thus used, the result would be to make what was intended to be a private deliberation, the constant subject of public investigation,—to the destruction of all frankness and freedom of discussion and conference.

"The rule on the subject has varied. Prior to 1785 a juror's testimony in such cases was sometimes received, though always with great caution. In that year Lord Mansfield, in Vaise v. Delaval, 1 T. R. 11, 99 Eng. Reprint, 944, refused to receive the affidavit of jurors to prove that their verdict had been made by lot. That ruling soon came to be almost universally followed in England and in this country. Subsequently, by statute in some states, and by decisions in a few others, the juror's affidavit as to an overt act of misconduct, which was capable of being controverted by other jurors, was made admissible. And, of course, the argument in favor of receiving such evidence is not only very strong, but unanswerable, when looked at solely from the standpoint of the private party who has been wronged by such misconduct. The argument, however, has not been sufficiently convincing to induce legislatures generally to repeal or to modify the rule. For, while it may often exclude the only possible evidence of misconduct, a change in the rule 'would open the door to the most pernicious arts and tampering with jurors.' 'The practice would be replete with dangerous consequences.' 'It would lead to the grossest fraud and abuse,' and 'no verdict would be safe.' Cluggage v. Swan, 4 Binn. 155, 5 Am. Dec. 400; Straker v. Graham, 4 Mees. & W. 721, 150 Eng. Reprint, 1612, 7 Dowl. P. C. 223, 1 Horn & H. 449, 8 L. J. Exch. N. S. 86."

Besides, this court has repeatedly followed the well-established rule that affidavits or testimony of jurors will not be received for the purpose of impeaching the verdict which they have solemnly made, and publicly returned into court. Colcord v. Conger, 10 Okla. 458, 62 Pac. 276; Barnes v. Territory, 19 Okla. 373, 91 Pac. 848; Pitchlynn v. Cherry, 32 Okla. 77, 121 Pac. 196; Tulsa Street R. Co. v. Jacobson, 40 Okla. 118, 136 Pac. 410; Glockner v. Jacobs, 40 Okla. 641, 140 Pac. 142; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Palmer, — Okla. —, 154 Pac. 1163.

In Glockner v. Jacobs, 40 Okla. 641, 140 Pac. 142, supra, Justice Riddle quotes with approval the syllabus in Tulsa Street R. Co. v. Jacobson, supra, as follows: "Upon grounds of public policy, jurors will not be heard by affidavit, deposition, or other sworn statement to impeach or explain their verdict to show on what ground it was rendered, or that they made a mistake, misunderstood the law or the result of their finding, nor permitted to show what items entered into the verdict, nor how they arrived at the amount. Jurors will only be heard in support of their verdict or conduct when same is attempted to be impeached."

And this doctrine has uniformly been adhered to by this court, except in Carter State Bank v. Ross, — Okla. —, 152 Pac. 1113, and, in so far as the holding in that case is in conflict with the views herein expressed, the same is overruled.

And the fact that the juror making the affidavit did not concur in the verdict returned does not change the rule. For the rule is based upon public policy, and is for the purpose of preventing litigants or the public from invading the privacy of the jury room either during the deliberations of the jury or afterwards. It is to prevent overzealous litigants and a curious public from prying into deliberations which are intended to be, and should be, private, frank, and free discussions of the questions under consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

Sharp, Ch. J., and Rainey, J., dissent. Thacker, J., dissents from the rule announced in the second paragraph of the syllabus, but concurs in the conclusion reached in the case.

All the other Justices concur.

Annotation—Impeachment of nonunanimous verdict by affidavits or testimony of dissenting jurors.

This note is confined to cases where by law the verdict is not required to be unanimous, and a verdict not unanimous is attacked by affidavits or testimony of one or more dissenting jurors.

The general rule against the impeachment of a verdict by jurors applies in the case of dissenting jurors where there is a nonunanimous verdict, and the decision to this effect in EGAN v. FIRST NAT. BANK, ante, 145, is sustained by authority. Saltzman v. Sunset Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1899) 125 Cal. 501, 58 Pac. 169; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Farrior (1917) 115 Miss. 96, 75 So. 777; Williamson v. Mullins (1915) — Mo. App. —, 180 S. W. 395; Vanderburg v. State (1912) 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 485, 120 Pac. 301; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Brown (1916) — Okla. —, 154 Pac. 1161; Spain v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co. (1915) 78 Or. 355, 153 Pac. 470, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 1104.

In Saltzman v. Sunset Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (Cal.) supra, the court affirmed an order refusing a new trial on affidavits of dissenting jurors as to misconduct of an assenting juror, not relating to assent by resort to chance, which, by statute, might be proved by affidavit of any juror, and stated in effect that the statute made an exception to the general rule, which proved it.

In Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Farrior (1917) 115 Miss. 96, 75 So. 777, where an attempt was made to impeach a verdict of nine jurors as quotient, by the testimony of one of the dissenting jurors, the court, while reversing the judgment on other grounds, held that the trial court rightly excluded the testimony of the juror.

So, where three dissenters made affidavits that the verdict was quotient, the court refused to consider them. Williamson v. Mullins (1915) — Mo. App. —, 180 S. W. 395.

In Spain v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co. (1915) 78 Or. 355, 153 Pac. 470, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 1104, the court, in reversing on another ground a case where a verdict had been returned by nine jurors, referred to the attempt to show by the affidavit of the three dissenting jurors that the verdict was a quotient verdict, and said, inter alia: "The distinction attempted to be made by counsel between affidavits made by jurors where a unanimous verdict is required, and cases where the affidavits are made by nonconcurring jurors under statutes such as ours, where three fourths of the jurors may return a verdict, finds no support in the authorities. The rule is the same in either case."

In Vanderburg v. State (1912) 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 485, 120 Pac. 301, the court, in affirming a conviction, said: "In support of a motion for a new trial the testimony of one of the jurors was taken, wherein he testified in substance that the verdict of the jury was not unanimous, and that he did not vote for a conviction. Two other jurors were permitted to testify that the question of taxes was discussed, and that the costs would be thrown on the state if they did not stick the defendant. It will be sufficient to say on this question that jurors will not be allowed to impeach their verdict by their affidavits or testimony after they have been discharged."

The affidavit of a nonassenting juror has been held not admissible on the ground that the alleged facts did not inhere in the verdict. Marvin v. Yates (1901) 26 Wash. 50, 66 Pac. 131, where, in affirming the striking out of an affidavit of a nonassenting juror as to the wrong method of calculating the amount of the verdict, the court said: "While it is true the one juror appears not to have joined in the verdict, still he was a member of the jury that returned the verdict, and we believe the same rule should apply to his affidavit as would apply to those of the other jurors. Affidavits of jurors will be received to show misconduct of the jury where they do not state alleged facts which necessarily inhere in the verdict itself. The affidavits must state facts concerning the acts of the jurors only. . . . This alleged misconduct inheres directly in the verdict itself, and cannot be considered."

OF APPEALS.

HENRY HENDRICKS

v.

THOMAS S. FORSHEY et al., Pliffs. in Err.

(— W. Va. —, 94 S. E. 747.)

Conspiracy — to breach contract — Liability.

Persons having similar individual contracts with a third person, who conspire together to breach them, and do breach them in pursuance of such conspiracy, whether for personal gain or sinister motives, are liable therefor in an action for tort in the nature of a conspiracy.

1-52 N. S.

(November 6, 1917.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wood County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for breach of a contract had by plaintiff with defendants to haul their milk. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. R. E. Bills and C. M. Hanna for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. William Beard for defendant in error.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff recovered a judgment against Thomas S. Forshey, Clarence E. Grewell, and M. W. Miller in the circuit court of Wood county, and they have brought the case here on writ of error.

The action is trespass on the case, and the declaration contains five counts. There was a demurrer to the declaration and to each count, which demurrer the court overruled as to the entire declaration and also as to the fourth and fifth counts, and sustained as to the first, second, and third counts. Plaintiff, by permission of court, amended his first count, and defendants again demurred to it as amended, which the court overruled. Defendants then pleaded not guilty, and issue was joined.

It is insisted the demurrer to the declaration should have been sustained, for the alleged reason that the fourth count avers a cause of action for breach of contract, whereas the other counts are in tort, and actions ex contractu and ex delicto cannot be joined. While the proposition embodies a well-established rule of pleading, counsel have misconceived the true import of the fourth count. It avers a cause of action in the nature of a conspiracy. It charges substantially that plaintiff had contracts with defendants and with others, severally, to haul their milk from their places of residence in the country to the city of Parkersburg, for a year, at 10 cents per gallon, of which defendants had knowledge, and that they unlawfully and maliciously confederated and combined and entered into a conspiracy to refuse to permit plaintiff to haul their milk, and in pursuance thereof breached their several contracts, wherefore plaintiff's business as a hauler of milk has been destroyed, and he greatly injured. These averments state a good cause of action on the case in the nature of a conspiracy. Porter v. Mack, 50 W. Va. 581, 40 S. E. 459. The contracts were several, not joint, and the wrong alleged is not simply the breach by each one of the defendants of his individual contract, but the breach of all of them in consequence of the unlawful combination and conspiracy. "If one wantonly and maliciously, whether for his own benefit or not, induce a person to violate his contract with a third person to the injury of that third person, it is actionable." West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Standard Oil Co. 50 W. Va. 611, 56 L.R.A. 804, 88 Am. St. Rep. 895, 40 S. E. 591; Thacker Coal & Coke Co. v. Burke, 59 W. Va. 253, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1091, 53 S. E. 161, 8 Ann. Cas. 885.

The first count is for slander, but the charge is not supported by the evidence, nor do plaintiff's counsel, in brief, contend that it is. But they do insist the verdict properly stands on the evidence supporting the charge in the fourth count.

Plaintiff testified that his contracts with the several defendants were made in the spring of 1915 and were for the period of a year; but defendants testified they were for no stated time, and they agree he was to receive 10 cents per gallon. Plaintiff was discharged on July 11, 1915, and defendants admit they met at the home of Mr. Butcher on the evening before, and talked over the matter of discharging plaintiff and hauling their milk themselves, each taking it by turns. Defendant Miller says: "We agreed to go trip about among ourselves." And defendant Forshey admits it was then agreed among them that he should call plaintiff on the phone the next morning and notify him not to come for the milk, that they were going to haul it themselves, which he did. He also admits he called up Mr. Thomas Hoffman, who he knew was plaintiff's customer, and solicited him to enter into the arrangement they had made to haul the milk in turns. This evidence supports the charge that defendants were induced to break their contracts by their concerted action and agreement among themselves to haul their own milk. The greater the number who could be induced to enter into that arrangement, the easier it would be for each of them, as each would then be required to make fewer trips. Probably no one of defendants, acting independently of the others, would have been willing to break his contract with plaintiff, if it necessitated his hauling his own milk, day after day.

Plaintiff proved he was earning about $60 a month by hauling cream for defendants and others in the neighborhood, independent of what he was hauling for himself, and lost these earnings as a result of the breach of their contracts by defendants. This evidence supports the jury's assessment of $263.83 as plaintiff's damages.

The judgment is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied January 16, 1918.

Annotation—Liability of individuals having contracts with the same person for combining to breach the same.

The general question of the right of action for damages for inducing a breach of a contract is treated in notes in 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 746; 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 615; and L.R.A.1915F, 1076.

The right to an injunction against inducing a breach of a contract or assisting in a continuance of such breach is discussed in notes in 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 202, and L.R.A.1917C, 782.

As to the liability of a third person for interfering with and driving away the customers of another, see note in L.R.A.1915B, 1180.

And as to liability for inducing the discharge of an employee, see note in 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 893.

The notes heretofore referred to on the question of the right of action for damages for inducing the breach of a contract show a gradual development of the question, and a growing inclination on the part of the courts to hold liable any person who knowingly induces a breach of a contract, even though the breach was merely the necessary result of the action of such person in promoting his own interests.

In the note appended to Wheeler-Stenzel Co. v. American Window Glass Co. L.R.A.1915F, 1076, in referring to this latter class of cases, it is said that "the doctrine that a contract between two persons precludes another from making an inconsistent contract with either of such parties without rendering himself liable with the other party for the injury resulting from the necessary breach of the contract involves dangerous possibilities, and, on the ground of expediency, if for no other reason, should not receive the sanction of the courts."

HENDRICKS v. FORSHEY, ante, 150, is a good illustration of the class of cases thus extending the rule, for while the doctrine is stated that if one wantonly L.R.A.1918C.

or maliciously, whether for his own benefit or not, induces a person to violate his contract with a third person, to the injury of that third person, it is actionable, yet the case in effect holds that a mere agreement between several persons employing the plaintiff to carry milk to thereafter carry their own milk, each taking it by turns, and their act in soliciting one of the plaintiff's customers also to enter into the arrangement, is evidence to support the charge that defendants were induced to break their contracts by a concerted action and agreement among themselves to haul their own milk, and this was apparently regarded as sufficient to show a conspiracy. It is not clear in this case whether the contracts to haul the milk were for a stated period or merely for an indefinite term.

While no other case closely resembling the HENDRICKS CASE as to its facts has been found, the following cases are sufficiently similar to be of interest:

In West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Standard Oil Co. (1902) 50 W. Va. 611, 56 L.R.A. 804, 88 Am. St. Rep. 895, 40 S. E. 591, in holding that an agreement between oil pipe companies and a refining company by which only oil transported through the pipes of such companies would be refined by the refining company did not constitute an unlawful conspiracy to injure a pipe line company not a party to the agreement, it is pointed out that if there had been subsisting contracts with oil producers for the conveyance of oil, and these contracts had been broken through a malicious conspiracy, it would be actionable.

In Sleeper v. Baker (1911) 22 N. D. 386, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 864, 134 N. W. 716, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1189, it is held that an action cannot be maintained against different individuals for conspiracy to induce, by dealing between themselves, the violation of separate contracts which the defendants had with the plaintiff. This decision, however, is based on the general ground that merely to induce a breach of a contract is not actionable, where the purpose was to promote the interest of the person who induced the breach.

It has been held that where, as a result of an agreement between insurance companies not to employ as agent any person who had been an agent of another company within a designated period of time, an agent employed for an indefinite time was discharged, he cannot hold the companies liable on the ground of conspiracy. Baker v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. (1901) 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1174, 55 L.R.A. 271, 64 S. W. 913.

And in the same jurisdiction it is held that tobacco buyers are not liable for injury to the business of a tobacco storage and sales house by agreeing among themselves that they will not attend sales at such place while a certain man is connected with the sales. Leech v. Farmers' Tobacco Warehouse Co. (1916) 171 Ky. 791, 188 S. W. 886.

In Beechley v. Mulville (1897) 102 Iowa, 602, 63 Am. St. Rep. 479, 70 N. W. 107, 71 N. W. 428, it is held that an insurance agent who was a member of an unlawful combination to control the insurance business in a locality could not recover damages for the cancellation of his agency contract with the different companies, due to an agreement among the companies, incorporated in the general agreement, to dispense with the services of any agent under certain circumstances.

An agreement among buyers of grain and produce not to buy of or sell to a certain person has been held to constitute an unlawful conspiracy where the parties had no legitimate interests of their own to protect thereby, and the purpose of the agreement was to destroy the plaintiff's business as a commission merchant. Ertz v. Produce Exch. Co. (1900) 79 Minn. 140, 48 L.R.A. 90, 49 Am. St. Rep. 433, 81 N. W. 737.

In Delz v. Winfree (1891) 80 Tex. 400, 26 Am. St. Rep. 755, 16 S. W. 111, it is held that it did not constitute an actionable wrong for cattle dealers to agree among themselves not to sell cattle to a butcher, but that they did render themselves liable if they undertook to induce others also to refuse to sell, since this constituted an unlawful interference with the plaintiff's business, and no justification of such interference was shown. #### Partition — right of infant to sue — absence of evidence — effect.

1. Nonresident infants for whom a statutory guardian has been appointed, who has been authorized by decree of court to institute proceedings for the partition of real estate on their behalf, have a right to sue, and a judgment entered on their petition is not void, although the evidence of the appointment and authority to sue is not filed in the partition proceedings until after judgment.

APPEAL by the purchasers of real estate from a judgment of the Circuit Court for McCracken County sustaining plaintiffs' exceptions to the report of, and setting aside, the sale of the land, in an action for partition. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. D. G. Parks for appellants.

Mr. Arthur Y. Martin for appellees.

Hurt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

W. B. Weaks and J. P. Weaks, both of whom are now dead, were joint owners of each of seven lots in the city of Paducah. The lots adjoined and were unimproved. Six of the lots are each 50 feet in width, while the other one is 52 feet, and each has a depth of 152 feet. It does not certainly appear that the lots have a frontage on any established street, but at one end they approach an alleyway. At the death of

W. B. Weeks, his interest in the lands was inherited by his children, Cornelia E. Weeks and William C. Weeks, subject to a right of dower of their mother, Willie W. Weeks. At the death of J. P. Weeks, his interest in the lots was inherited by his children, Mabel C. Weeks, Marie Antoinette Weeks, and Beulah Weeks, subject to a right of dower in their mother, Nettie L. Weeks, who has since intermarried with H. E. Doss. Mabel C. Weeks is an adult, but Marie Antoinette, Beulah, Cornelia E., and William C. Weeks are infants. This action was instituted by Mabel C. Weeks, William C. Weeks, and Nettie L. Doss, in their own right, and by Cornelia E. and William C. Weeks, by their statutory guardian, Willie W. Weeks, and by Marie Antoinette and Beulah Weeks, by their statutory guardian, Nettie L. Doss, for a sale of each of the lots and a division of the proceeds, upon the ground that the lots were not susceptible of division between the owners, and an allotment to each of his portion in severalty, without materially impairing the value of the lots and of each interest therein. The proceeding was under § 490, of the Civil Code of Practice. Willie W. Weeks and Nettie L. Doss each consented to the sale and agreed to accept the value of their respective dowers in money out of the proceeds of the sale, in lieu of an allotment of dower in the realty. The infants Cornelia E. and William C. Weeks reside in the state of Kentucky, but the other infant plaintiffs, Marie Antoinette and Beulah Weeks, reside in the state of Tennessee.

The proceeding was ex parte, but the petition, in substance, averred that Willie W. Weeks had been duly appointed and qualified as the statutory guardian of Cornelia E. and William C. Weeks, by and in the county court of Christian county, Kentucky, which county was alleged to be that of their residence, and a certified copy of the orders of that court, showing the appointment and qualification, was filed with the petition. It was also averred that Nettie L. Doss was the duly qualified and acting guardian of Marie Antoinette and Beulah Weeks; that she had been appointed such by the county court of Wilson county, in the state of Tennessee, wherein they resided, and had duly qualified in that court, and that she had, upon a petition to the county court of McCracken county, Kentucky, wherein the lots are situated, been authorized, by an order of that court, to prosecute this action as the guardian of Marie Antoinette and Beulah Weeks, under the appointment of the county court in Tennessee. The title papers under which the property was held by the ancestors of the petitioners were filed with the petition. A copy of the records of the county court in Tennessee, showing the appointment and qualification of Nettie L. Doss as the guardian of Marie Antoinette and Beulah Weeks, was filed before the submission of the action, and the correctness of the validity of it was certified by the clerk of that county court, with its seal attached, but it was not certified as required by the Federal law, nor as required by the statutes of this state, so as to authorize a court of this state to consider it as evidence of the truth of the facts therein stated. Ky. Stat. § 1636; Williams v. Duncan, 92 Ky. 125, 17 S. W. 330. A copy of the judgment of the McCracken county court which the petition alleged existed, and which authorized Nettie L. Doss to institute and prosecute this action as guardian, by the county court in Tennessee, as provided by § 2041, Kentucky Statutes, was not filed. Evidence was taken tending to prove that the lots were not divisible without impairment of their value, and of the respective interests therein. In this state of the record, the action was submitted and a judgment rendered in accordance with the prayer of the petition, decreeing a sale of the lots separately and then a sale of them as a whole, and directing the commissioner to accept and report the bid from which would be realized the largest sum of money. Before the sale the commissioner caused the lots to be appraised, and the appraisers fixed their value, as a whole, at the sum of $2,000. A sale was regularly made, and the appellants became the purchasers of all the lots sold together as a whole for the sum of $1,825. The sale was regularly reported and the appellees, who are the plaintiffs below, filed exceptions to the report of sale, and it is from the judgment sustaining two of the exceptions and setting aside the sale that this appeal is prosecuted.

(1) The court adjudged that the sale be set aside and vacated upon two grounds, one of which was that the judgment directing the sale was void, because the court, at the time the judgment was rendered, did not have jurisdiction of the infants Marie Antoinette and Beulah Weeks, nor of their guardian, by whom the two infants were prosecuting their suit, as there was no competent evidence on file at the rendition of the judgment showing that the guardian had been duly appointed and qualified, or had been authorized by a court in this state to prosecute the action, as provided by § 2041, Kentucky Statutes, supra. Of course, if the court which renders a judgment is without jurisdiction to do so, the judgment and all proceedings under it are void. However, pending the exceptions, the appellants, who were the purchasers at the sale, filed in the case a properly certified copy of the order of the county court in Tennessee, and also of the judgment of the McCracken county court in Kentucky, which authorized Nettie L. Doss, as guardian under the appointment by the Tennessee court, to act as guardian for her wards in this state. These existed and were in full force and effect when the action was instituted. This is an action which can be instituted and prosecuted by an infant, by his guardian, when the guardian is legally authorized to act for him. The authority, without doubt, existed in the instant case. Ky. Stat. § 2041; Civ. Code Prac. § 35, subsec. 4; Shelby v. Harrison, 84 Ky. 144; Bell v. Clark, 2 Met. (Ky.) 573; Williams v. Duncan, 92 Ky. 125, 17 S. W. 330; Watts v. Wilson, 93 Ky. 495, 20 S. W. 505; Woolridge v. Woolridge, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 97, 80 S. W. 775. In Shelby v. Harrison, 84 Ky. 144, which was a suit under § 490, Civil Code, the guardian, who owed his appointment to a court in Illinois, where he and his wards resided, entered their appearance and joined in the prayer for the sale of the lands, and alleged that he had been authorized by the county court in the county where the lands were situated in Kentucky to act as guardian, under his foreign appointment. The purchasers at the sale of the land were the exceptors. This court said: "It is substantially stated in the petition and answer that Carter H. Harrison, the father of the two infant defendants, was, under the laws of the state of Illinois, appointed and qualified as their guardian; and, although the proper record evidence of his appointment and qualification was not filed in this case until after the sale of the property to appellants, still, the fact being established, the defect in their title, which might otherwise have existed, has been to that extent cured, and they have now no right to complain on that account."

In Henning v. Barringer, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 674, 10 S. W. 136, the mother was statutory guardian of all her children, except one, and sued, alleging that she was the guardian of all, and also as their next friend, but failed to file the affidavit required by § 37, Civ. Code, which is required to be done where one sues as a next friend. After the sale, but before confirmation of it, she was appointed statutory guardian for the one for whom she had not been theretofore appointed. The purchasers of the land were exceptors to the report of the sale, upon the ground that the above irregularities made the title they would receive defective. The court, after saying that, if all the parties were before the court, the title was good, added: "They were all before the court, because, in this particular state of case, an infant may bring the suit for the sale, and, J. R. A. 1918C.

under the Code, can sue by his guardian or next friend, and that he sues both by his guardian and next friend would only be the subject of special demurrer, and could afford them no ground for reversal unless it appeared that the rights of the infant had been prejudiced by the proceeding."

Referring to the failure to file the affidavit, as a ground for claiming that the mother had no right to sue, the court said: "The affidavit is to the effect that there is no guardian—no one else to sue; but in this particular, when the fact is made to appear of the existence of the right to sue, before the purchaser acquires the title, it is not a jurisdictional fact, such as would destroy the judgment and render it void, but would be held bad on demurrer at the instance of the parties to the action."

The right of the two infant wards of Nettie L. Doss existed in this action to sue by her as their statutory guardian, when the action was instituted, and hence the infants, as well as the guardian, were before the court upon their petition, and the judgment was not void. When, before the sale was confirmed, the necessary evidences were filed to assure the purchaser a good title under the above-mentioned cases, the court was in error in holding that the judgment for the sale of the lands was void, and an exception based upon that ground should have been overruled. Webb v. Webb, 178 Ky. 152, 198 S. W. 736. It should be added that a purchaser at a sale of infant's real estate cannot be required to accept a deed and pay the price until the evidences of the right of the guardian to institute and maintain the suit appear in the record; but where the right of the guardian to maintain the suit existed, and, before the confirmation of the sale, the proper evidences of such right appeared in the record, the purchaser cannot complain. There does not appear to be any good reason why the guardian and his wards should complain of a judgment of the court which they have sought, when the right of the guardian to maintain the action existed, and, before a sale of the property is confirmed, the evidences of such right appear in the record, and the nature of the proceeding is such as to give the court jurisdiction of the parties preceding the rendition of the judgment.

(2) The other ground upon which the circuit court set aside the sale was that the regular judge of the circuit court, who rendered the judgment decreeing a sale of the lots, was a joint purchaser of them at the sale, and for such reason the sale was invalid. It appears from the proceedings that the judge, after he was reported to the court as one of the purchasers, declined to further preside in the action, and a special judge was agreed upon, by him and his joint purchaser upon one side and the petitioners upon the other, to hear and determine the exceptions to the report of sale, and to make the necessary further orders in the action. For the first time in this jurisdiction the question is presented for determination as to what effect upon the validity of a decretal judicial sale of an infant's real property will be exerted by the fact that the judge who ordered the sale became the purchaser of the property when it was sold by the commissioner of the court, who is the agent of the court in effecting the sale. It is due to say, before entering upon a discussion of this question, that the judge who made the purchase in the instant case is of distinguished character and ability, and there is no ground, as appears from the record, to infer that in rendering the judgment for the sale of the property he was actuated by any motive other than a disinterested performance of a duty, or that he then had any purpose or design to become a purchaser of the property; and though he was the actual bidder at the sale for himself and his coappellant, his conduct did not evince any purpose to use his position as a high judicial officer for a personal advantage, nor did there appear upon his part any disposition to be other than fair toward other bidders and persons who might be bidders. Hence the only question here is, If a judge who, in the court over which he presides, orders the sale of infant's real property by the commissioner of the court, and then becomes the purchaser at the sale, will the sale be valid?

In 24 Cyc. 29, the general rule is declared to be as follows: "No person can become a purchaser at a judicial sale, who has a duty to perform in reference thereto which is inconsistent with the character of purchaser, or who is so connected with the sale that his individual interest as a purchaser might be inconsistent with his duty. Thus the person who sells at a judicial sale may not become the purchaser, either directly or indirectly. Neither can the judge who ordered the sale become the purchaser or be interested as a purchaser."

In 16 R. C. L. p. 107, the rule is declared to be as follows: "A judge of a court having some duty to perform in ordering, conducting, or confirming a judicial sale therein, the performance of which may conflict with the interests acquired by a purchase at the sale, occupies a position of a trustee, and a purchase by him is assailable, as in the case of any other trustee."

The principle upon which the above doctrine is asserted is that the judge who orders, conducts, or confirms a judicial sale is an agent designated by law, or, in other words, a trustee, for the purpose of effecting the sale of an infant's real estate, and when the general doctrine of agency or trusteeship is applied to him, it renders him incapable of purchasing the property, which is by law confided to his discretion as to whether a sale of it shall be made; and this principle applies to an agent of any kind, because the doctrine is universal that an agent for the sale of his principal's property cannot sell it to himself. Where an agency is created by law for the sale of the property of those who are incapable of giving consent or contracting sales, or where the property is to be sold without the consent of the owner, the agents whom the law designates to perform the duties of making such sales cannot be purchasers at such sales. Trustees who make sales of trust estates cannot be purchasers, except for the benefit of the cestuis que trustent, or else for the protection of themselves. Guardians who make sales of their wards' estates, administrators and executors who make sales of decedents' estates, likewise fall under the inhibition of this rule. This rule is founded more upon general principles than upon the circumstances of any particular case, and, as said in Stapp v. Toler, 3 Bibb, 450: The doctrine "rests upon this, that the purchase is not permitted in any case, however honest the circumstances; the general interests of justice requiring it to be destroyed in every instance, as no court is competent to the examination and ascertainment of the truth in much the greater number of cases."

The courts are the agencies provided by law for the sales of real property, the owners of which, from infancy or infirmity of mind, are incapable of making contracts for sales for themselves, and they are also the agents provided by law for enforced sales of property of debtors in satisfaction of claims of creditors. One class of sales is made under judicial decrees by commissioners of the court. Another class of sales is made by executive officers, under writs of execution issued by virtue of judgments rendered by the court. Sheriffs and other executive officers who make sales under execution, as well as those officers who collect the revenues by distraint, cannot become purchasers at the sales made by them. Ibid.; Smith v. Pope, 5 B. Mon. 337; Devers v. Dallam, 6 T. B. Mon. 102. In the instant case, however, the discussion of this question will be confined to sales made under judicial decrees by a commissioner, as the organ of the court, as in the instant case. The courts have sternly refused to allow their commissioners, who are the mere agents of the court, to carry into effect the orders made by the judges of the courts, to become purchasers at judicial sales made by the commissioners. In Price v. Thompson, 84 Ky. 219, 1 S. W. 408, the commissioner of the court made a purchase of lands which the court had ordered to be sold, and in declaring the sale to be void the court used this language: "Officers whose powers are not merely persuasive, but coercive, ex parte, and arbitrary, should be held to strict impartiality, fidelity, and integrity in the discharge of their trusts. All temptation to make private gain [or] to take unfair advantage, directly or indirectly, should be removed. The most effective way to do so is to declare all such transactions conclusively invalid."

In Bagby v. Eversole, 6 Ky. L. Rep. 365, it was said: "A commissioner in chancery cannot become a purchaser at his own sales or reap any benefit from a purchase by another, under an agreement that he is to be regarded as a joint purchaser. Such contracts are against public policy."

To the same effect is Penn v. Rhoades, 124 Ky. 798, 100 S. W. 288; Sears v. Collie, 148 Ky. 444, 148 S. W. 1117; 24 Cyc. 29. All such purchases are at least voidable and will be set aside upon exceptions. It is true that this court has made a distinction between a purchase at a judicial sale by the commissioner who makes the sale, and a purchase by an appraiser of the property at such sale, who may be, in a way, considered one of the agents in effecting a judicial sale. It was held in Barlow v. McClintock, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 894, 11 S. W. 29, and in Ison v. Kinnaird, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 569, 17 S. W. 633, that an appraiser at a judicial sale might become a purchaser, and the sale would not be vacated, unless it could be shown by evidence that the appraiser intended to become a purchaser before or while engaged in his duties as an appraiser, thus making the validity of the purchase by an appraiser depend upon the fact of his having been actually fraudulent in the performance of his duties, while the rule as applied to a purchase by a commissioner making the sale, directly or indirectly, does not depend for its validity upon the ability of the parties to show any fraudulent conduct of the commissioner, but the sale is held invalid because of the office which he holds, and no investigation is necessary to be made into the circumstances of the sale. In the two cases, supra, the purchase by the appraiser was upheld, as the property in neither instance sold for as much as the appraisement, and the facts also demonstrated that the property had sold for its fair value. The reason for the distinction made between a sale to an appraiser and a sale by the commissioner to himself, or to someone for his benefit, arises, doubtless, from the difference in the duties of the appraiser and commissioner, as the appraisement would not have any effect upon the price of the property if the sale was fairly made, and the only evil influence which an interested and designing appraiser could exert would be to fix the value of the property, by the appraisement, at a sum lower than its value, and thus probably deprive the owner of his equity of redemption; and, besides, the appraiser has no duty to perform in ordering or ratifying the sale, nor in its conduct, except to make the appraisement.

Thus it appears that if, in the instant case, the commissioner, who merely executed the judgment as the agent of the court, had, either directly or indirectly, become the purchaser of the lands, there would be no difficulty in holding, either upon principle or according to precedent, that the exceptions to the sale on account of his purchase should be sustained; but it is contended that, if the judge of the court who made and caused to be entered the judgment under which the commissioner acted should become the purchaser at the sale under the judgment, his purchase should be sustained, when it should be ratified by some other judge than himself. The adjudications in other jurisdictions growing out of the purchase at judicial sales by the judge who made the decree have been instances in which the judge was the purchaser, in person or through some other person, and thereafter confirmed the report of sale, and sales under these circumstances have been uniformly held to be void or voidable. It does not seem that anyone would controvert the conclusion in these cases. Such are the cases of Hoskinson v. Jaquess, 54 Ill. App. 59; Livingston v. Cochran, 33 Ark. 294; Tracy v. Colby, 55 Cal. 67; Scott v. Calvit, 2 La. 69. The above cases are decided upon the principle that the judge was a trustee for the parties to the suit, and that when he became a purchaser his interest as purchaser was antagonistic to his duties as an agent or trustee, and when he confirmed the sale that he was, furthermore, sitting as a judge in his own cause, and the agreement is made in the instant case, to distinguish it from cases similar to the ones above cited, that the judge who makes a purchase at a decretal sale, where the order for the sale was rendered by him, and the confirmation of the sale is made by another, thereby does not become a judge in his own cause, and the reason ceases for holding that he cannot become a purchaser. If, however, he should contemplate becoming a purchaser, before or at the time he enters the decree for the sale, it would be impossible for the parties to establish such fact by evidence, and the vice will be as great as when a judge actually sits in his own cause, as the interest with which he would be invested as a prospective purchaser of the property would be antagonistic to the duties incumbent upon him as a trustee for the owner of the property. In Livingston v. Cochran, 33 Ark. 294, the court said: "A probate judge should not be permitted to purchase lands at a sale ordered by himself, for he might be tempted to order a sale to the prejudice of the persons interested in the estate."

In Walton v. Torrey, Harr. Ch. (Mich.) 259, a judge made an order for a sale of infant's property by their guardian, and then he became interested as a purchaser through another. The sale was held to be void, and in discussing the ground upon which the decision was rested the court said: "It is placed upon the grounds of disability to purchase, arising from the office which the purchaser held. And the case quoted by Chancellor Kent [Davoue v. Fanning, 2 Johns. Ch. 268], on that occasion, extends the disability to guardians, judicial officers, and all other persons who, in any respect, as agents, had a concern in the disposition and sale of the property of others, whether the sale was public or private, judicial or otherwise."

The case referred to was that of Davoue v. Fanning, 2 Johns. Ch. 268. In Texas it is held that a purchase made by a judge at a sale ordered by him is void. Frieburg v. Isbell, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 25 S. W. 988; Halsey v. Jones, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 25 S. W. 697; Nona Mills Co. v. Wingate, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 609, 113 S. W. 182. The case of Thompson v. Buffalo Land & Coal Co. 77 W. Va. 782, 88 S. E. 1040, does not militate against the views herein expressed. It will be observed that the courts in Texas and Michigan, and probably others, hold that a purchase made by a judge under a decree rendered by him is void, and the same contention was made in the case, supra, which was determined in the supreme court of West Virginia. In that case, the purchaser judgment for the sale, and the confirmation was by another judge. The sale had been confirmed and deed made. It is held in that jurisdiction that a decision rendered by an interested judge is not void, but only voidable, and that a sale made to a party to a suit who does not move the decree cannot be set aside for an error which is not jurisdictional, and hence the court determined that the sale in that case was not void, but was only voidable; and it would seem that it is the better doctrine,—that a purchase at a judicial sale, made by a person who is incapable of making the purchase, by law, is not void but voidable. 24 Cyc. 30; Sears v. Collie, supra.

The circuit court, as above stated, is the agency provided by law in which the necessary proceedings must be had and steps taken to effectuate the sale of infant's real estate; the judge of the court is the person designated by law to order such a sale and to have supervision over its conduct and confirmation; it is his duty to see that the interests of the infants are safeguarded and protected; the sales in such cases are made by the court, and its commissioner is its organ for that purpose, and the personnel of the commissioner is designated by the judge of the court; the bids are propositions for a purchase made to the court; the judge is the judicial officer of the court and is invested with the duties of a trustee in relation to the interests of the infants, and although he declines to preside upon the motion to confirm the sale made to him, under a decree rendered by him, he at least has had the ordering of the sale, and is so connected with the sale that his individual interest as a purchaser would be inconsistent with his duties, or might be so, and in such state of case the sale would be declared invalid, without reference to the particular facts and circumstances of the case, upon the application of interested parties.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Annotation—Purchase by judge at judicial sale.

The right of an executor or administrator to purchase at his own sale is treated in the note to Haymond v. Hyer, L.R.A.1918B, 7.

The authorities establish the proposition that the fact that the judge who ordered and confirmed the sale became the purchaser thereat is sufficient ground for setting the sale aside, without regard to the question of actual fraud. And some of the cases apparently regard such a sale as absolutely void, and not merely voidable. In BAKER v. WEAKS, ante, L.R.A.1918C.

152, the position is taken that a sale to the judge who ordered it is voidable, even if it is confirmed by another judge. This view does not seem necessarily in conflict with the cases cited in the note holding that such a sale is not void, and this distinction is pointed out in the BAKER CASE.

A sale of land under order of the probate court was held void in Frieburg v. Isbell (1894) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 25 S. W. 988, because the judge who ordered the sale became the purchaser thereat, and confirmed the sale to himself.

And it was held in Tracy v. Colby (1880) 55 Cal. 67, that it was ground for setting aside an administrator's sale that the probate judge who ordered and confirmed the sale was a party interested in the purchase of the land by prior agreement made with the one to whom it was nominally sold. And it was held immaterial whether there was actual fraud.

Also in Walton v. Torrey (1836) Harr. Ch. (Mich.) 259, it was held that the fact that the probate judge who ordered the sale of land of an infant became a joint purchaser thereof was sufficient ground for setting aside the sale, although there was no evidence of an intention to commit a fraud.

And in E. E. Forbes Piano Co. v. Hennington (1910) 98 Miss. 51, 53 So. 777, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1216, it was held that a sale on execution was invalid because the property was purchased by the justice of the peace who rendered the judgment on which the execution was issued. A statute required that in such a case the execution must be returned to the court rendering the judgment; and the court stated that if a justice were allowed to purchase at an execution sale under a judgment rendered by him, he might be called upon to sit in review upon the validity of the sale in which he was interested as purchaser. And the contention was overruled that the sale should be upheld on the theory that the rule prohibiting purchases by a judge applied only to judicial sales, and that a sale by a justice of the peace was not of this class.

So, where a land certificate issued to minor heirs was sold by their guardian under order of the probate court, the judge who ordered the sale becoming the purchaser and confirming the sale, and receiving a deed therefor, it was held in Nona Mills Co. v. Wingate (1908) 51 Tex. Civ. App. 609, 113 S. W. 182, that the sale was void as against parties claiming through the heirs, and that neither the lapse of time nor subsequent proceedings in the matter of guardianship could serve to validate the deed so as to predicate title thereon. In this case the guardian's account containing a report of the sale was approved, about three years after the sale, by another judge, and an ingenious but unsuccessful argument was made that this was in effect a confirmation of the sale; that although the confirmation by the judge who purchased the certificate was void L.R.A.1918C.

by reason of the constitutional provision that "no judge shall sit in any case wherein he may be interested," yet the judge who purchased was not disqualified when the order of sale was made, that such order was valid, and that he did not become disqualified until he became the purchaser at the sale which he had ordered; and that the subsequent approval of the guardian's final account by another judge as in effect a confirmation of the sale rendered it valid.

And where the county judge who ordered and approved a sale of land of an infant devisee procured an attorney to purchase the land in his wife's name, for his use, at a price which he knew was about half the inventory value of the land, and a few days after confirmation of the sale sold the land to a third party for more than twice the purchase price, it was held in Hoskinson v. Jaques (1894) 54 Ill. App. 59, that he should be required to refund to the devisee, with interest and costs, the excess received by him over the purchase price at the sale.

It was held in Livingston v. Cochran (1878) 33 Ark. 294, that specific performance of a judicial sale at which the probate judge who ordered and approved the sale and others who entered into an agreement with him to make the purchase became the purchasers could not be enforced by one who, with full knowledge of the facts, purchased their bid. The court said: "A probate judge should not be permitted to purchase lands at a sale ordered by himself, for he might be tempted to order a sale to the prejudice of persons interested in the estate. Moreover, it is his duty to see that the sale has been conducted fairly, and in accordance with law and the order of sale. When the land is sold upon credit, as in this case, it is incumbent on him to see that the sureties of the purchasers are responsible, and finally to confirm the sale if properly made, or to set it aside and order a resale, if illegal or improvidently made. . . . He deposes that he approved the sale as probate judge. But he was not an impartial judge. He was interested in the sale. Had he disapproved the sale, set it aside, and ordered a resale, he and his partners would have been obliged to refund to the appellee the profit which they had made upon their bids. In approving the sale, he also passed upon his own solvency as a surety upon appellee's note for the purchase money, which was indelicate. . . . The conduct of the probate judge in relation to the sale was, in the eyes of the law, fraudulent, and involved a breach of public trust, and such a sale cannot be enforced for the benefit of appellee, who purchased his bid with the full knowledge of the facts."

However, the fact that at a probate sale the brother of the judge who made the sale became the purchaser, and afterwards conveyed the land to the judge, was held in Scott v. Calvit (1830) 2 La. 69, not to show necessarily that the judge was in reality the purchaser, so as to render the sale void.

And the court was of the opinion in Scott v. Calvit (La.) supra, that even if the sale was a nullity because the purchase was in reality made by the judge who ordered the sale, such nullity was only relative, and could be taken advantage of only by the heirs or creditors of the succession.

Also in Woods v. Monroe (1868) 17 Mich. 238, it was contended that an administrator's sale of land was void on the ground that the property was bid off by a third party for the probate judge, and deeded to the latter before the sale was confirmed. But it was held that the proof did not support this contention, although the deed was dated prior to the confirmation and it was conceded that the judge had paid the purchase money to the administrator; the third party testifying that he purchased the land for himself, and that the sale was confirmed before any conversation on the subject occurred between him and the judge, and that the deed was not executed or delivered until after the confirmation.

Where several distinct tracts of land were sold by an administrator, it was held in Bacon v. Morrison (1874) 57 Mo. 68, that the validity of the sale of one of the tracts was not affected by the facts that another of the tracts was purchased by the probate judge, and that the judge approved the report of the sale, covering both tracts, even if the purchase by the judge was void.

The case of Thompson v. Buffalo Land & Coal Co. (1916) 77 W. Va. 782, 88 S. E. 1040, is sufficiently set out in BAKER v. WEAKS, ante, 152. The rule is laid down in the syllabus by the court in the Thompson Case that a judge who has no interest in decreeing a sale of land does not violate the principle that a judge should have no interest in the subject-matter of suits which he decides, by afterwards becoming the purchaser at the sale, provided it is fairly made and is confirmed by another judge.

And the fact that the presiding judge in the court in which the judgment was L.R.A.1918C.

rendered purchased an interest in the judgment after issuance of execution thereon, and was interested with the nominal purchaser in the purchase of the land on the sale under the execution, was held in Cooper v. Galbraith (1819) 3 Wash. C. C. 546, Fed. Cas. No. 3,193, not necessarily to render the sale void, where the judge who was thus interested did not confirm the sale. The court, in instructing the jury, said: "The lessor of the plaintiff is charged with judicial misconduct and gross fraud in acquiring the title on which this action is founded. Let it be premised that fraud and misconduct of the gross nature imputed to [the judge] are not to be presumed, but the reverse. He who makes these charges must establish them by evidence to your satisfaction. It should also appear that the fraud or misconduct imputed to him was of a nature to injure the defendant, and was applicable to the particular subject which you have to decide. . . . The assertions that a judge cannot legally become interested in an execution which has issued under the authority of the court of which he is a member, or in property sold under such execution, and that by making such acquisitions he is guilty of a breach of his duty as a judge, do not receive the sanction of this court. It may be indiscreet in him to do so; and it may be unbefitting the dignity of his station to speculate in purchases of this sort, unless under very peculiar circumstances. Whenever a question comes before a court, in which the judge knows that he has an interest of any kind, he violates decorum, morality, and law by remaining on the seat of justice and giving an opinion in the case. We should not hesitate in saying that a claim founded upon such a gross breach of duty ought not to receive the countenance of any court. But we do not understand, even from the defendant's counsel, that the plaintiff gave any judicial opinion respecting the sale of this property, or that any question was, at any time, brought before the court, which called for judicial interposition, except on [the date of confirmation], when he very properly retired from the bench."

Where a county judge who was directed by the commissioner's court of the county to sell land of a judgment debtor of the county to pay the judgment, having failed in his attempt to obtain authority to bid for the county or to get others to purchase the land, purchased it at the sale in his own name, in good faith, and thereafter offered to convey it to the county, which refused the offer and credited the purchase price on an indebtedness of the county to the judge, it was held that the settlement thus made was valid and precluded the county from recovering the land four years thereafter, when the judge had sold part of it and placed improvements on the remainder. Felts v. Bell County (1910) 103 Tex. 616, 132 S. W. 123, reversing (1909) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 120 S. W. 1065.

Assignment for creditors — receipt of check — effect.

Where a debtor assigned all his property to a trustee to be sold and the proceeds paid to his creditors in proportion to the amount of their several claims, and the assignment provided that the amount received by the creditors accepting thereunder would be in full settlement and satisfaction of all claims of said creditors, and where the trustee voluntarily sent to a creditor who had refused to agree to the assignment or participate therein his check for the amount the creditor would have been entitled to had he agreed to become a party thereto, which check the creditor offered to accept as part but not in full payment, if the debtor would consent, but which consent was refused, held, that the mere failure to return the check without presenting same for payment or making other affirmative use thereof did not amount to an acceptance of same as payment in full satisfaction of the debt.

ERROR to the District Court for Ottawa County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover the amount of an indebtedness alleged to be due plaintiff by defendants. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John L. Crank, for plaintiff in error:

Plaintiff is entitled to judgment for $371.63 and for costs of suit, instead of $155.08 and having to pay the costs.

A majority of creditors cannot force the minority to accept a small per cent of their claim, against their will and consent.

Messrs. Horace B. Durant and Holmes, Yankey, & Holmes, for defendants in error:

The retaining by plaintiff of the check under the circumstances under which it received it was in the nature of an acceptance, the entire transaction being in the nature of an accord and satisfaction.

1 C. J. p. 563; Day-Luellwitz Lumber Co. v. Serrell, 177 Ill. App. 30.

Miley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action upon an admitted debt amounting to $371.63 and interest, alleged to be due the plaintiffs in error by defendants in error. The only defense was that the plaintiffs below before suit accepted a check for $155.08 from a trustee to whom the defendants had assigned their property for the benefit of their creditors under circumstances which made it a discharge of the whole debt. The assignment provided that the amount received by the creditors accepting thereunder would be in full settlement and satisfaction of all claims of said creditors.

The cause was submitted in the court below upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears that the defendants were indebted to the plaintiffs in the amount claimed; that the assignment was executed as alleged, that practically all creditors, except the plaintiffs, agreed to the same, but that the plaintiffs refused to participate therein; that the trustee voluntarily sent to plaintiffs a check for $155.08, being the pro rata share of their claim, which was received by the plaintiffs prior to the commencement of the action, and is still retained by them, but has never been cashed; and that the plaintiffs offered to accept the check and apply the proceeds on the amount of the indebtedness if the defendants would agree, but which they refused to do.

The trial court found that the "plaintiffs, by retaining said check and not returning same to the trustee prior to the trial, had accepted and agreed to the terms of the assignment and composition," and rendered judgment accordingly, to reverse which this proceeding in error is prosecuted by the plaintiffs below.

It is unnecessary to determine in this action whether the receipt and acceptance by a creditor of a payment by the trustee of a less sum than that due, with knowledge of the condition named in the assignment that such payment should be in full settlement, would operate as a bar to an action for the recovery of the balance from the debtor. Assuming that it would be a bar, the question arises whether the mere failure to return the check amounted to an acceptance of same as such payment. We think not. A check of itself does not operate as an assignment of any part of the funds to the credit of the drawer with the bank, and the bank is not liable to the holder unless and until it accepts or certifies the check (Rev. Laws 1910, § 4239), and, until presented and paid, or accepted or certified by the bank, is revocable by the drawer, who has the legal control of the moneys to his credit (First Nat. Bank v. School Dist. 31 Okla. 139, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 655, 120 Pac. 614). A check, without regard to whether that of the debtor or of a third person, does not constitute payment, unless it is agreed that it shall be taken as an absolute payment. 30 Cyc. 1207. While the agreement to so accept a check may be implied from the facts and circumstances of the transaction, to do so in this case would disregard the agreed facts, that the plaintiffs offered to allow the amount to apply on the indebtedness, but not as full satisfaction. If, after refusal to allow application of the amount as part payment, the plaintiffs had cashed the check, had the same certified, or made some affirmative use of it, there might be force to the contention that they were bound by the conditions attached to the tender thereof. But, in our opinion, more than the mere receipt and retention of the check, with knowledge of the conditions under which it was sent, is essential to constitute acceptance thereof as full payment and satisfaction of the debt. Groh v. Great Eastern Casualty & Indemnity Co. 155 Ill. App. 18; Emerson v. Gerber, 178 Mass. 130, 59 N. E. 666. Defendants contend that delay for an unreasonable length of time to return the check will amount to an election to accept the same as payment in full settlement. This might be true if, in addition to retaining the check, the plaintiffs had failed to give notice of their refusal so to accept it. Furthermore, there was no evidence of the date the check was received by plaintiffs; hence it cannot be determined that it had been in their possession an unreasonable length of time when suit was commenced.

The right of the trustee to recover of the plaintiffs if he has suffered any injury by reason of their retention of the check, or the liability of the plaintiffs if any loss had been caused by delay in presenting or returning the check (Rev. Laws 1910, § 4236), is another matter.

We hold that the plaintiffs were upon the agreed facts entitled to recover the full amount of the indebtedness, and the judgment is accordingly reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for plaintiffs for the amount of the debt and interest thereon.

All the Justices concur.

Annotation—Failure to return check as affecting question of payment.

Upon the general question of the payment of draft or bill, see note in 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 26. As to tender by check, see note in 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 232.

As to whether or not a check or draft is payment of an insurance premium, see note in L.R.A.1916A, 674.

Ordinarily the mere failure of a creditor to return a check sent him by the debtor in whole or partial payment of the debt does not constitute a payment of the debt, where the creditor does nothing indicating his intention and purpose to receive the check in payment. WHEELER & M. MERCANTILE CO. v. KITCHEN, ante, 160 (check was for less than the amount of the debt, but contained an indorsement that it was in full thereof); Patten v. Lynett (1909) 133 App. Div. 746, 118 N. Y. Supp. 185 (creditor retained checks, one for a month and the other for six weeks, and then returned them); Flynn v. Woolsey (1890) 57 Hun, 590, 32 N. Y. S. R. 953, 10 N. Y. Supp. 875 (check was for less than the amount of debt and contained an indorsement that it was "in full;" check tendered back upon trial of action to recover the debt); Washington Real Estate Co. v. Wachenheimer Bros. (1909) — R. I. —, 71 Atl. 592 (check for less than amount of debt was tendered as in full thereof).

Where a bank upon which a check was drawn was at the time under assignment and hopelessly insolvent and hence the check was worthless, the retention thereof by the creditor did not indicate an intention to appropriate it as payment for the debt. Herider v. Phoenix Loan Asso. (1900) 82 Mo. App. 427.

Where the purchaser of property upon being pressed for payment gave checks upon a bank with the understanding with the seller that he then had no funds in the bank to meet the checks but would have money on deposit to do so in a few days, the seller agreeing to hold the checks for that period of time before presenting them for payment, the transaction did not constitute a payment where before the expiration of this time the purchaser went into bankruptcy and the checks were never paid. Pfueger v. Lewis Foundry & Mach. Co. (1904) 67 C. C. A. 102, 134 Fed. 28.

It has been held that it is not necessary that there should be an express agreement that a check should be received as payment; the circumstances and conduct of parties may show an express understanding that the check was taken in satisfaction of the debt, or estop the creditor from claiming the contrary; for example, where a check was sent for the express purpose of payment and was retained under circumstances implying that it was so accepted. Conde v. Dreisam Gold Min. Co. (1906) 3 Cal. App. 583, 86 Pac. 825. Even the retention of a check for an unreasonable length of time without returning or offering to return it has been held to constitute payment. Day-Luellwitz Lumber Co. v. Serrell (1913) 177 Ill. App. 30. And see Bloomquist v. Johnson (1903) 107 Ill. App. 154, holding that where a check sent in full for an account was returned to the debtor, but was subsequently taken back, then retained a few weeks by the creditor, and then again returned to the debtor, its retention unexplained tended to show an acceptance of the check, on the conditions upon which it was tendered. Compare with Groh v. Great Eastern Casualty & Indemnity Co. (1910) 155 Ill. App. 18, holding that the insured in an accident policy, by retaining a check containing a receipt in full for the amount due under the policy without indorsing the check, did not thereby accept it as an accord and satisfaction of his claim.

A postdated check received by a creditor and indorsed by him to a third person constitutes payment where it is retained by the latter. Skolsky v. Harvitt (1910) 121 N. Y. Supp. 592.

Where a seller took an agent's personal check in part payment for the goods sold to his principal for cash, and agreed to and did hold the check for a short time for the agent's accommodation, it constituted a payment as to the principal. L.R.A.1918C.

pal. Cleveland v. Pearl (1890) 63 Vt. 127, 25 Am. St. Rep. 748, 21 Atl. 261.

Where by a provision of the Code drawers or indorsers of bills of exchange are exonerated if the bill is not presented for payment within a designated time after it has been received, the check of a third person received by a creditor, and not presented for payment within the time designated, constitutes a payment of the debt. Manitoba Mortg. & Invest. Co. v. Weiss (1904) 18 S. D. 459, 112 Am. St. Rep. 799, 101 N. W. 37, 5 Ann. Cas. 858.

Retaining a check sent in full for rent up to the time the landlord commenced suit for the rent will estop him to assert that the check was not a tender of the rent due, the tender being kept good by a deposit in court by the tenant. Donovan v. Maloney (1912) 3 Boyce (Del.) 453, 84 Atl. 1032.

Of course if the debtor is injured by the negligence of the creditor in failing to present a check for payment, to the extent of the injury the check is generally held to operate as a payment. The cases involving this question, however, are not included herein. As illustrative of such cases see Mankey v. Hoyt (1911) 27 S. D. 561, 132 N. W. 230.

And see Western Pacific Land Co. v. Wilson (1912) 19 Cal. App. 338, 125 Pac. 1076, holding that where a check sent in full for the balance due on account was retained by the creditor for about a month without expressly refusing it and until after the bank upon which it was drawn closed its doors as insolvent, it was a question for the jury whether or not the giving and retention of the check had the effect of payment.

As to the effect on the drawer's liability of delay in presenting a check, where the drawee remains solvent, see note appended to 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 255.

SEPARATE APPEALS by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Iowa County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiffs decedent through fraudulent representations of defendants in an exchange of certain properties. Reversed.

Statement by Eschweiler, J.:

One Max Brickman, now deceased, and for whose estate the plaintiff was appointed special administrator after the commencement of the action, conducted a general store at Linden, Wisconsin. The defendant Schoenfeld was a minister at Dodgeville, Wisconsin, dealing to some extent in real estate also, particularly lands in North Dakota, and at the time in question had an option or right to sell a farm of 480 acres in Mercer county in that state, owned by one Stewart. The defendant Elliott was a merchant at Richland Center, Wisconsin, and engaged in selling real estate, and owned another 480 acres in Billings county, North Dakota, about 70 miles from the tract in Mercer county. Elliott met Brickman through one Sullivan, a real estate agent living at Lone Rock, Wisconsin, and a meeting was had between Elliott and Brickman at Linden to discuss a trade of the North Dakota land for Brickman's store. Elliott knew that defendant Schoenfeld had this option on the Mercer county lands at the time. An arrangement was made between Elliott and Brickman whereby Sullivan was to accompany Brickman to inspect lands in Dakota proposed to be traded, and on September 20th, while on the

they have parted with thereunder may be recovered. It is also a general rule that an agent or broker is personally liable in damages to third persons for any actual fraud he commits upon them in acting for his principal. No other case has been found, however, which decides the question passed upon by CASSON v. SCHOENFELD, as to whether an agent or broker is liable in damages to a mentally incompetent person for dealing with him in behalf of his principal, if he knew, or ought to have known, of the mental disability of such person.

The authorities which the court cites in support of its decision did not consider the right to damages nor the liability of an agent or broker, but the right to avoid the contract or transaction in question and recover what the incompetent person had parted with.

The authorities which the court cites in support of its decision did not consider the right to damages nor the liability of an agent or broker, but the right to avoid the contract or transaction in question and recover what the incompetent person had parted with.

way, and at Madison, they met defendant Schoenfeld, who was then intending to visit other lands in North Dakota than either of these two tracts. It was then arranged that Schoenfeld should accompany Brickman instead of Sullivan. It was understood as between the two defendants that in case Brickman was not satisfied with the Billings county land belonging to Elliott that the tract in Mercer county might be used for the purpose of an exchange. Schoenfeld and Brickman went to Hebron, North Dakota, and at that place Schoenfeld had one Barker take Brickman to see the land in Mercer county, at a distance from Hebron of about 40 miles, and on this trip Brickman did not see the Billings county land owned by Elliott. Schoenfeld and Brickman were on the train together on their return trip, which was about September 25th.

On the return a written contract was made, which was not produced by either party on the trial, and dated September 26th, purporting to be between Elliott and Brickman for the exchange of the store property at Linden for the farm in Mercer county. There is a dispute between the parties as to whether this contract was written out by Schoenfeld at Madison on the way back, or at the Brickman store in Linden one or two days after such return.

On October 8th the parties again met, and it is uncontradicted that a further written agreement was made out by Schoenfeld and signed by the two, arranging for the taking of an invoice of the stock of goods at the Linden store, and such invoice was taken, and there is no dispute as to the amount thereof, and such amount was the basis for the judgment for damages entered by the court upon the special verdict.

The material parts of the special verdict of thirteen questions were: That, before the transfer was made, Elliott told Brickman that the 480 acres of land Elliott owned in North Dakota were worth at least $25 an acre, were black loam soil, and free from stone; that such representations induced Brickman to go to North Dakota with defendant Schoenfeld to look at said 480 acres with a view of entering into the trade; that such representations were relied upon and were the inducement to Brickman to exchange his stock of goods for the 480 acres of land and to assume the payment of a $3,000 mortgage thereon; that defendant Schoenfeld did not make statements concerning the character of the land similar to those the jury found that Elliott made; that Schoenfeld in what he did to promote the trade of the 480 acres of land for Brickman's store was acting as an agent of Elliott and in his own interest. L.R.A.1918C.

By the tenth question of the special verdict the jury found that at the time Brickman entered into the contract of exchange he was mentally deranged; by the eleventh, that when Brickman transferred his stock of goods he was not of sufficient mental ability to know what he was doing and the nature of the act done, and did not have ability to exercise reasonable judgment in regard to such act. (To this finding defendants filed no exception or any motion to set aside the same.) By the twelfth and thirteenth questions they found, respectively, that Elliott and Schoenfeld at the time of the trade knew, or as men of ordinary intelligence, observation, and prudence should have known, that at the time the trade was negotiated and carried out Brickman was mentally deranged, and not of sufficient mental ability to exercise reasonable judgment in regard to such trade.

The jury also found that the representations as to the kind of soil and the value of the land were not true, and that the land was worth but $15 an acre, and that the market value of the stock of goods was the invoice price.

After motions by both parties the court ordered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $5,691 and costs against the two defendants, from which judgment each of the defendants appeals to this court.

Messrs. Jeffris, Mouat, Oestreich, & Avery, for appellants:

On the findings of the jury and the undisputed facts, defendant Schoenfeld is entitled to judgment in his favor.

Eschwoller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant Schoenfeld contends that there was no evidence to support a judgment against him. The two defendants contend that the court erred in admitting evidence and in assessing the measure of damages, or erred in refusing to grant a new trial.

There is no way of determining from the record herein, including the decision of the trial court in passing upon the motions made after verdict, whether the judgment is entered against the defendants on the theory that the plaintiff was entitled to recover on the ground of false representations, which may be considered as one cause of action, or because the stock of goods was obtained from Brickman by the defendants at a time when Brickman was mentally incompetent to transact the business, and when such condition was known or ought to have been known by the defendants and they took advantage of such condition, which may be considered as a second cause of action. It would appear from the respondent's brief on appeal that he apparently relies in support of this judgment on the theory of such second cause of action.

Upon the face of the verdict as it stands a judgment could be properly entered against the defendant Elliott on the ground that by reason of his false representations as to the character and the value of the land conveyed to Brickman the latter was induced, and to his damage, to transfer his stock of goods to Elliott. The jury, however, have expressly acquitted the defendant Schoenfeld of making representations similar to those which they find the defendant Elliott made concerning the land. This would necessarily prevent entering a judgment against the defendant Schoenfeld on the ground of any false representations inducing the contract, unless such a judgment could be supported by the finding that what Schoenfeld did in inducing the trade by Brickman was done in his own interest and as agent for Elliott. There is no finding, however, and no expression by the trial court to the effect, that he found that Schoenfeld knew that Elliott had made any representations to Brickman concerning this land, and manifestly, unless he did know that fraud had been practised by Elliott in representing this land to Brickman, the mere fact that he acted as agent in such transfer would not be sufficient to make him liable with Elliott on the ground of false representations. There is testimony to the effect—by members of Brickman's family—that Schoenfeld was present at one or more interviews between Brickman and Elliott before the day on which the contract to make an inventory of the goods was made on October 8th, and that on one or more of such prior visits Schoenfeld also made similar representations as to the value and nature of the 480-acre tract. But both Schoenfeld and Elliott deny that Schoenfeld was present prior to October 8th at any interview between Elliott and Brickman at Linden, where the members of the family claim such representations were made by Schoenfeld. The jury have expressly found in their answer to the fourth question that the testimony of the defendants was true as to there being no representations made by Schoenfeld. This, therefore, fairly construed, should be held a determination in defendant Schoenfeld's favor of the question as to whether Schoenfeld was present at those prior meetings and therefore chargeable with knowing of Elliott's representations, because such actual presence there before October 8th is necessarily involved, as the testimony stands herein, in the determination of that fourth question of the verdict. There is no other view of the evidence in the record which would support a finding, or warrant this court in assuming under § 2858m a finding, that Schoenfeld knew, or ought to have known, that Brickman was induced to make this trade by virtue of any false representations made by Elliott concerning the land, and consequently there is no support for upholding the judgment against Schoenfeld on the basis that he is liable as for false representations.

If, however, defendants knew, or ought to have known, that at the time of the exchange by which Elliott got the stock of goods, in October, 1910, from Max Brickman, that Brickman was so mentally deranged as to be incompetent to transact such business, they could nevertheless be held to have participated in a fraud upon him by taking advantage of that condition, and for that they could be required to respond in damages. Encking v. Simmons, 28 Wis. 272; Halley v. Troester, 72 Mo. 73; Creekmore v. Baxter, 121 N. C. 81, 27 S. E. 994; Crawford v. Scovell, 94 Pa. 48, 39 Am. Rep. 766; 12 R. C. L. p. 585; 22 Cyc. 1205.

If there was no material error committed on the trial amounting to substantial prejudice to the rights of the defendants in the admission or rejection of testimony, it would be our duty to sustain this judgment on what might be considered this second cause of action for such fraud perpetrated by defendants in so taking advantage of Brickman's incompetency to their benefit or his harm. The defendants, however, now insist on three grounds, each claimed to be a substantial prejudicial error occurring on the trial: First, the admission by the court of the testimony of the widow and children of Max Brickman as to his conduct and appearance, indicating mental incompetency and derangement at and prior to the time of the exchange of property; and second, the admission, over objection, of the testimony of Dr. Lorenz of the State Hospital for the Insane at Mendota, to which institution Brickman was committed November 17th following the exchange of property; and thirdly, as to a hypothetical question propounded to and permitted to be answered by Dr. Lorenz and Dr. Green as medical experts as to whether, under the facts stated in such question, purporting to relate to the condition of Brickman, a person of average intelligence and prudence situated towards him as were Elliott and Schoenfeld should have known that Brickman was not in a mental condition to understand business or business dealings.

On the first question thus raised, we are satisfied that the ruling of the trial court in admitting the evidence of the members of the family of the deceased was proper and cannot be disturbed. They were permitted to testify as to what they saw in the conduct of Brickman prior to this exchange, and from such conduct the inference might well have been drawn that he was deranged. Such testimony did not either call for transactions between such witnesses and the deceased which could be excluded under § 4069, nor did they call for testimony that violated the provisions of § 4072, which prevents either husband or wife disclosing confidential communications.

The matters of observation thus called for were substantially all of such a nature as were wholly unparticipated in and uninfluenced by them, and were not, as to the wife, anything in the nature of a confidential communication, and such evidence was properly admitted under the rule in Schultz v. Culbertson, 125 Wis. 169, 172, 103 N. W. 234; Burnham v. Mitchell, 34 Wis. 117, 133.

It should be noted, however, that such testimony, although admissible as to the question of Max Brickman's mental competency, would not necessarily be admissible on the question whether defendants knew or ought to have known of any incompetent condition that might be found to exist, without proof that the facts so testified to were either known to defendants or were of such a nature that they must have been known to them.

The second question, as to whether Dr. Lorenz, the examining physician of the male patients who were committed to the State Hospital for the Insane at Mendota, might properly be permitted to testify as to results of his personal examination of Max Brickman at the time of his commitment, involves the consideration of § 4075, Wis. Stat., which reads as follows: "No person duly authorized to practise physic or surgery shall be permitted to disclose any information which he may have acquired in attending any patient in a professional character, and which information was necessary to enable him to prescribe for such patient as a physician or to do any act for him as a surgeon; but as a witness in his own behalf, he may disclose such information in any civil action brought by such patient or his legal representatives to recover damages for malpractice in such professional attendance, and also in any criminal prosecution for such malpractice, whenever such patient or his legal representatives shall have first given evidence relating to such information."

The language is broad and absolute. Such a statute has been declared to be for the benefit of the patient, that matters learned in the confidential and sacred relationship that exists between patient and physician shall not be revealed to any third person except with the express consent or L.R.A.1918C.

waiver of the patient himself. It is to protect him, or his memory, from possible shame and disgrace. Boyle v. Northwestern Mut. Relief Asso. 95 Wis. 312, 322, 70 N. W. 351; Re Hunt, 122 Wis. 460-467, 100 N. W. 874; Davis v. Supreme Lodge, K. H. 165 N. Y. 159, 163, 58 N. E. 891.

It is essential, nevertheless, that the examination and information declared to be protected from disclosure shall be obtained in order that the physician may treat, cure, or alleviate the condition of the patient. And where the examination is solely for the purpose of determining the question of an individual's mental competency with a view to an application for her release from guardianship, and where it is beyond question not for the purpose of curing or helping her, the ban of the statute does not exist. Re Bruendl, 102 Wis. 48, 78 N. W. 169, so much relied upon in this case by plaintiff. Where the physician was permitted to testify as to the result of his examination when it was solely for the purpose of determining whether or not such person had a venereal disease, in order to permit testimony in respect to that to be given in a criminal case in which the person so examined was claimed to have been assaulted by the defendant, and where clearly the examination was not for the purpose of prescribing, it was properly received. James v. State, 124 Wis. 130, 102 N. W. 320.

Under the Code of the state of New York, § 834, which is substantially the same as our § 4075, except that the word "allowed" is used instead of the word "permitted," a physician who attended a person who had taken poison, although not called for by such person, and indeed ordered away by the patient, who refused his services, yet in fact did nevertheless attend and treat the patient, and learned of the fact of the taking of the poison, was not allowed to testify. Meyer v. Supreme Lodge, K. P. 178 N. Y. 63, 64 L.R.A. 839, 70 N. E. 111.

By § 561q, Wis. Stat., the duties of superintendent of such a hospital for the insane are specified, and among the duties prescribed it is provided that such superintendent shall be responsible for the care, health, and treatment of the inmates; shall cause to be kept a daily record of each inmate, and report monthly to the State Board of Control the name of each patient during the preceding month, with a brief statement of his or her mental and physical condition and form of insanity. Dr. Lorenz, the one examined, although not the superintendent, was in charge of the male patients of the institution, and all examinations of such patients were made by him, and a report was made by him, or under his direction, of such examination. Over objection he was permitted to disclose that from the physical examination and the test made of the spinal fluid of Brickman he ascertained that Brickman was suffering from a disease of the brain induced by a serious affliction, and that must have been of ten to twelve years' standing; that from the nature of such disease and the condition he then found him in Brickman must have been deranged and incompetent to transact business affairs for a year at least prior to the transaction in question.

We see no reason why § 4075 does not squarely meet this situation and exclude the testimony of one situated as was Dr. Lorenz and prohibit him from giving such information as he did, being the result of his examination, just as well as though he had been called in as a private physician to treat Brickman. It was, as he said on his examination, part of his duty to classify the inmates, study their insanity, the cause of it, and their condition, to determine whether they are treatable and recoverable and what kind of treatment they are to receive, if any. Even were there no such testimony here, it is manifest that the commitment of individuals to such institution is for the purpose of treatment and care, and the present high standard of such institutions could not be upheld and maintained if the sole purpose and object of them was to merely detain such patients, and not give them care and treatment tending to alleviate, if possible, their unfortunate condition. Almost this precise question has been passed upon by this court in the case of Mehegan v. Faber, 158 Wis. 645, 149 N. W. 397, where the records kept by the superintendent of the Wisconsin Tuberculosis Sanitarium were held to be properly excluded under this § 4075, Stat. The same rule is recognized in Massachusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Michigan Asylum, 178 Mich. 193, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 22, 144 N. W. 538, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 146; Smart v. Kansas City, 208 Mo. 162, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 565, 123 Am. St. Rep. 415, 105 S. W. 709, 13 Ann. Cas. 932; Jones, Ev. §§ 759, 760a.

We therefore hold that the public official who as a physician or surgeon learns in that capacity information concerning a patient committed to his care, or to him for examination in order that such physician or surgeon may be able to determine what treatment, if any, should be had, or whether any treatment is possible tending to cure, benefit, or alleviate that patient, shall not be permitted to give such information to anyone unless by consent of the patient.

That a public record is required to be kept by such physician or institution does not affect the rule. A legislative provision for the filing of certain documents as public L.R.A.1918C.

reports by physicians is not a legislative declaration that the secrecy of § 4075 as to physicians has been relaxed. Cohodes v. Menominee & M. Light & Traction Co. 149 Wis. 313, 135 N. W. 879.

We are urged that the rule in the case of Olson v. Court of Honor, 100 Minn. 117, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 521, 117 Am. St. Rep. 676, 110 N. W. 374, 10 Ann. Cas. 622, to the effect that the privilege of such a statute may be waived by the representatives of the deceased patient, as well as by the patient himself, should be now adopted instead of the one so long held by this court, viz., that such a provision can be waived by the patient only, and not by anybody after his death. Re Hunt, 122 Wis. 460-466, 100 N. W. 874; Green v. Nebagamain, 113 Wis. 508, 89 N. W. 520. But a rule so long established is more properly a subject of legislative, and not judicial, modification.

That such evidence so improperly received was vitally material and important in this case is very manifest. It necessarily must have had important weight and bearing with the jury in determining the questions herein, not only as to the nature and extent of Max Brickman's mental incompetency and whether or not, if such existed, it should have been detected by defendants, but also the question as to whether Brickman relied upon any representations that might be found to have been made, and so, therefore, it must be held to have been a prejudicial error as against both defendants as to either of the two theories upon which a cause of action may be predicated.

The great weight that was given to this testimony can also be seen from the statement made by the trial court in his rulings on the motions after verdict, to the effect that, even if the testimony of members of the family as to the condition of Max Brickman were disregarded, it was to the court beyond dispute, from the testimony of Dr. Lorenz, that Brickman was the victim of such brain disease, the result of the trouble with which he had been afflicted for several years, and was therefore not of sufficient mental capacity to make the trade.

The plaintiff offered in evidence,—and it was received by consent of counsel for defendants,—the proceedings at the commitment of Brickman to the hospital in the county court on November 17 following the exchange of October 11, 1910. Although this was the nature of the testimony of the condition existing at a period subsequent to the one material to the issues, yet it was before the jury, and it appeared that the information which the physicians in that examination received was obtained by them from Mrs. Brickman, and it appears therefrom that the symptoms of the disease were first manifest within two or three weeks prior to November 17th, bringing it subsequent to the time of the transfer; that such was the first attack; that the cause of the attack was from his thinking he was defrauded in the sale of the store; that his physical condition was good; that he had not manifested anything peculiar in temper, habits, or disposition, or pursuits, before the accession of the disease, and, so far as the physicians can learn, had never had any sign of serious disease. It should be noticed also from the records that it appears that no suggestion of the condition of brain disease or serious affliction was made from any of the other witnesses until Dr. Lorenz's testimony had been admitted.

Furthermore, the recital of such facts so testified to by Dr. Lorenz was embodied in both of the hypothetical questions put to him and to Dr. Green as to whether or not in their judgment such person was incompetent, and so incompetent that third persons should have recognized that fact.

In view of the sharp conflict of evidence on the essential questions in the case, we are constrained to hold that the admission of the testimony of Dr. Lorenz as to the result of his examination of Max Brickman was such an error that it worked a substantial prejudice to the defendants, and that it must result in a reversal of the judgment.

On the third point urged; viz., error in allowing the other hypothetical question put to Dr. Lorenz and Dr. Green, asking, in effect, whether in their judgment persons of ordinary intelligence and prudence should have known, situated as the defendants were towards Brickman, that Brickman had not sufficient mental ability to know what he was doing and the nature and quality of the act and the consequences thereof, the answer in each instance being that the witness thought defendants should have known, — this is no more and no less than asking the witness whether any person should have known from the acts and conditions of Brickman as recited in the question that he was incompetent to transact business. This is not such a form of question as calls for expert testimony; for it is permitting the witness to do just what the jury is expected and required to do, and is not properly a question for what is generally called expert testimony.

If a person of ordinary intelligence and prudence could have detected from the condition of Brickman his mental incompetency, then it was not a situation that required expert knowledge to inform the jury; for what the average man can detect for himself is clearly within the province of the jury. As it was held in Knoll v. State, 55 Wis. 249, 42 Am. Rep. 704, 12 N. W. 369, L.R.A.1918C.

it was erroneous to admit the testimony of an expert testifying as to a comparison by him made, which he said any person could have made as well as himself. The same doctrine is recognized as correct in Lomoe v. Superior Water, Light, & P. Co. 147 Wis. 5, 11, 132 N. W. 623; and in Mellor v. Utica, 48 Wis. 457, 4 N. W. 655; Koblenschlag v. State, 23 Tex. App. 264, 4 S. W. 888.

It was from the very form of the question not a matter which partakes of the nature of a science, so as to require any course of previous habit or study in order to permit one to be better fitted to answer the question than the ordinary individual is. What impression a given state of facts would have upon the ordinary individual can be as well told by the jurors themselves as by any individual in the witness box, and such a question therefore was not the subject of expert testimony. State v. Brooks, — Iowa, —, 165 N. W. 194; Dougherty v. Milliken, 163 N. Y. 527, 79 Am. St. Rep. 608, 57 N. E. 757; Higgins v. Dewey, 107 Mass. 494, 9 Am. Rep. 63; Wight Fireproofing Co. v. Poczekai, 130 Ill. 139, 22 N. E. 543; 17 Cyc. 46.

The objection, therefore, to this form of question should have been sustained. If the other evidence before the jury had been properly received, we would not have felt inclined to reverse the case on this error alone.

The defendants also raise the question as to the measure of damages as found by the jury in the first question of the special verdict; but we are satisfied that there is evidence to support such finding, and it ought not be disturbed.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Sommerville, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff sued defendant for $10,000 damages for and on behalf of his minor son, August Louviere, for personal injuries suffered by the latter while traveling as a passenger on one of defendant's electric cars, which was being operated over a suburban track running between New Iberia and Jeanerette.

Plaintiff also sued for $5,000 damages on his own behalf, for the mental anguish suffered by him because of said accident; but he appears to have abandoned the claim.

There was a verdict for $1,200 in favor of plaintiff and against defendant, and a judgment for that amount in favor of plaintiff for the use and benefit of his minor son.

Defendant appeals; and plaintiff asks for an amendment of the judgment by increasing it to $10,000, for the benefit and use of his minor son.

Plaintiff alleges, and defendant admits, that August Louviere, the minor son of plaintiff, was a passenger standing on the rear platform of one of defendant's cars, and that another car following ran into the rear of the forward car in such manner that the forward platform of the rear car overlapped the platform on which Louviere was standing, and that a leg of Louviere was caught and crushed between the two platforms.

Plaintiff alleges negligence on the part of defendant company in not having properly manned and equipped the rear car which collided with the forward car, and in negligently operating it.

Defendant alleges that the accident was unavoidable, and that August Louviere was guilty of contributory negligence, and it denies liability.

If defendant was not negligent plaintiff cannot recover, for liability of a carrier of passengers for damages "is bottomed on negligence."

But the facts of the case, as disclosed by the record, render it unnecessary to consider the alleged negligence of the defendant, as they show that plaintiff's son, a young man about twenty years of age, was culpably negligent at the time of his injury and of the alleged negligence of defendant, and that the injury to him would not have happened except for negligence on his part.

Plaintiff's son, together with several young friends, boarded a trailer attached to a trolley car of defendant. They took positions and stood on the rear platform of the trailer, when there were many vacant seats in the cars. There was a printed warning on the car to go inside, and not to stand on the platform. The conductor several times told plaintiff's son and others to "come into the car;" and when the car in the rear was getting close to the trailer the conductor halloosed to those on the rear platform to come into the car. The conductor saw the danger of a collision, and "got back in the car, because there was no chance of Morris [the motorman of the rear car] stopping his car." Regardless of these warnings, Louviere persisted in remaining in the dangerous position he had taken, laughing and flagging down, with his hat in his hand, the motorman of the fast-coming and uncontrolled car. His uncle, a passenger on the rear car, went to the front platform of that car, and halloosed and waved his hat to those on the rear platform of the forward car to get off the platform. His warnings were unheeded by Louviere. The other boys on the platform finally appreciated their dangerous position, and went into the car or jumped off the platform, as the forward car had made a stop, and was moving very slowly at the time. There was great confusion on and in the cars at the time, because all saw and knew that the rear car was not under control of the motorman, and that there would be a collision. Louviere retained his position, not realizing his danger, he says, until it was too late. When he turned to go into the car the collision took place; he fell down; and the platform of the rear car was forced over the platform of the forward car, and his leg was crushed between the two platforms. No one was injured except Louviere, and had he been inside of the car, where he should have been, and where he was told to go by the conductor and others, he would have escaped injury also. He undoubtedly contributed towards the injury which befell him; it would not have happened to him except because of his negligence; and he cannot recover damages from the defendant.

Louviere says in his testimony, had he known the collision "was going to happen, I would have gotten off," or "walked inside." Others knew the collision would happen, and he should have known it. Others got off the platform in time, and he should have done so. He admitted: "If I had not been on the platform, it wouldn't have hurt me. . . . I didn't think they would bump."

The law is that "a passenger must exercise ordinary care, and such care only, for his own safety; that is, such care as an ordinarily prudent man would exercise for his safety and security under the same circumstances." 10 C. J. p. 1096.

"One may be guilty of contributory negligence in failing to anticipate and act upon the contingency of another's negligence." Erie R. Co. v. Kane, 55 C. C. A. 129, 118 Fed. 223.

"One who voluntarily and unnecessarily exposes himself to a known and great danger, and thereby directly contributes to his injury, cannot escape the fatal effect of his contributory negligence because the negligence of the defendant which concurred to produce the injury, and of which he was ignorant, [and which] made the danger greater than he supposed it to be." Gilbert v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 63 C. C. A. 27, 128 Fed. 529.

"When an injury would not have happened, except for the culpable negligence of the party injured, concurring with that of the other party, no action can be maintained." Woods v. Jones, 34 La. Ann. 1086.

"If one's negligence proximately contributed to the injury, so that without his concurring fault it would not have happened, he cannot recover for the injury." Sibley v. New Orleans City & L. R. Co. 49 La. Ann. 589, 21 So. 850.

It is said in the above case that "the plaintiff seeks to support the position that he was ordinarily prudent in riding upon the steps by quoting from Beach, on Contributory Negligence, § 149: 'It is not negligence per se for a passenger to ride upon the platform or steps of a railway car.' In the section from which the quotation is made the text-writer says: 'But, if there is standing room within the car, it is negligence to occupy the platform.' It appears that the cars were crowded, and that there were no vacant seats. It was not made evident by preponderance of proof that there was no standing room. In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Carroll, 5 Ill. App. 201, it was held: 'So long as there is standing room in the cars, he must ride there.' There is authority in support of the position that upon this point the burden of proof was with the plaintiff. 'He must prove that he was there from necessity, and not from choice.' Camden & A. R. Co. v. Hoosey, 99 Pa. 492, 44 Am. Rep. 123."

The concurring negligence of plaintiff, contributory negligence, is defined by the court in the case of White v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. 42 La. Ann. 990, 8 So. 475, as the "negligence but for which, notwithstanding defendant's negligence, the injury would have been avoided."

In Woods v. Jones, supra, the victim of the accident was riding on a train composed of an engine, an empty coal car, and a caboose in which seats had been placed for trainmen and passengers. He took a seat in the coal car instead of in the caboose. The train ran off the track, and he was thrown from the coal car and killed. No one in the caboose was injured. The court L.R.A.1918C.

say: "It is clear that, had Woods taken a seat in the caboose, as ordinary foresight prescribed, and the example of all others dictated, the deplorable occurrence would not have made him the victim of his audacity."

In the case of Bemiss v. New Orleans City & L. R. Co. 47 La. Ann. 1671, 18 So. 711, the court hold: "It is negligence to go from one car to another while the train is in motion. If a passenger on a train in motion attempts to go from one car to another and is thrown from the platform by the sudden jerk of the train, the defendant corporation is not responsible."

In the case of Oliver v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 43 La. Ann. 804, 9 So. 431, 3 Am. Neg. Cas. 566, it was held: "A party voluntarily boarding a crowded train and taking his place on the platform of a car, without complaint, or effort to obtain a seat or other better accommodation, cannot assign the overcrowding of the train as negligence in the railroad company."

"A passenger who voluntarily and unnecessarily places himself in a position of danger cannot hold the railway responsible for injuries of which his position is the efficient cause; as, for instance, his riding on the platform of a moving car, contrary to the request of the conductor." Fisher v. West Virginia & P. R. Co. 42 W. Va. 183, 33 L.R.A. 69, 24 S. E. 570, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 459.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Jones, 95 U. S. 443, 24 L. ed. 507, 7 Am. Neg. Cas. 340, held, in a case where the plaintiff was riding upon the pilot of an engine when a caboose had been provided for passengers, that there was not liability, saying: "The liability of the company was conditioned upon the exercise of reasonable and proper care and caution on his part. Without the latter, the former could not arise. He and another who rode beside him were the only persons hurt upon the train. All those in the box car, where he should have been, were uninjured. He would have escaped also if he had been there. His injury was due to his own recklessness and folly. He was himself the author of his misfortune. This is shown with as near an approach to a demonstration as anything short of mathematics will permit. The case is thus clearly brought within the second of the predicates of mutual negligence we have laid down. Hickey v. Boston & L. R. Co. 14 Allen, 429, 9 Am. Neg. Cas. 454; Todd v. Old Colony & F. River R. Co. 3 Allen, 18, 80 Am. Dec. 49; s. c. 7 Allen 207, 83 Am. Dec. 679, 9 Am. Neg. Cas. 449; Gavett v. Manchester & L. R. Co. 16 Gray, 501, 77 Am. Dec. 422, 3 Am. Neg. Cas. 742; Lucas v. New Bedford & T. R. Co. 6 Gray, 64, 66 Am. Dec. 406, 3 Am. Neg. Cas. 735; Ward v. Central Park, N. & E. River R. Co. 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. 411; Galena & C. Union R. Co. v. Yarwood, 15 Ill. 468, 9 Am. Neg. Cas. 208; Doggett v. Illinois C. R. Co. 34 Iowa, 284."

The accident to Louviere occurred on a fast-moving suburban car, and prudence required that he should have observed the ordinary rules concerning safety on fast-moving trains. He should not have stood on the platform, and thus have violated one of the rules of the defendant company, and have unnecessarily exposed himself to the injury which befell him.

There were many vacant seats in the cars at the time he boarded the trailer, and after the cars were filled there was standing room in them. He should have gone into one of the cars; and he should not have remained on the platform, particularly when he saw, or should have seen, the danger of a collision with a fast-coming and uncontrolled car bearing down upon the car he was on.

In the state of Ohio a suburban railway is classed by statute as a street railway; but in that state it was held that the law of negligence governing the standing on a platform of a moving interurban car outside of a municipality is the same as in the case of steam cars. Cincinnati, L. & A. Electric Street R. Co. v. Lohe, 68 Ohio St. 101, 67 L.R.A. 637, 67 N. E. 161, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 663.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled, avoided, and reversed, and that the plaintiff's suit be dismissed at his cost.

Plummer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action grew out of a contract for paving blocks made by the plaintiffs with Otto Anderson December 29, 1909. The defendant was surety on a bond given by Otto to the plaintiffs for the faithful performance or fulfilment of the contract. Otto Anderson agreed to deliver upon the cars or upon a plot of land leased by the plaintiffs prior to November 1, 1910, 700,000 paving blocks for $30 per thousand; delivery to be upon the plaintiffs' written order, the plaintiffs to pay 75 per cent of the agreed price upon the acceptance of the blocks as delivered, and the balance after the blocks were laid; but in any event to pay the full price of all blocks accepted by them by December 1, 1910. The contract further provided that, in case of Otto's failure to deliver blocks as ordered, the plaintiffs should have the right to purchase such blocks elsewhere at Otto's expense. Otto shipped all the blocks ordered. He also delivered on the leased land other blocks. From time to time Otto furnished the plaintiffs memoranda made up from his cutters' returns of the blocks so delivered. These were accepted by the plaintiffs, and payment made in accordance with the contract. Before any payments were made Otto directed them to be made to the defendant, and all payments were made by check to the defendant, who used all the money in Otto's business, retaining none for his own use. Otto did not furnish 700,000 blocks before November 1st, and the plaintiffs did not order that number, as the contract required they should. Some time after December 1st, the parties adjusted the matters under the contract, and the bond was returned to the defendant, and destroyed. At the time of this settlement it was understood that Otto had delivered on the leased land 138,100 blocks besides those which had been shipped. On these blocks, in accordance with the contract, the plaintiffs had paid 75 per cent of the purchase price, and were then obligated to pay the balance, but by agreement between them and Otto, they paid him $5 more per thousand for the 138,100 blocks, and retained $2.50 per thousand for expense of loading and shortage until the blocks should be shipped on the cars the following spring. Upon this basis the accounts between the parties were computed, and a balance of $1,046.39 found to be due Otto, and a check for that sum was made out to the defendant, and delivered to him. This payment was made January 25, 1911. In loading the blocks upon the cars in the following September a shortage of 44,714 blocks was discovered. As the $2.50 per thousand reserved for that purpose was insufficient to meet a deficit of this extent, the plaintiffs brought this suit against the defendant, and claimed to recover the overpayment: First, in an action of debt on the bond; and, second, in a count in assumpsit for money had and received.

Under the count in debt the plaintiffs state their claims as follows:

"(1) The bond is valid despite its destruction under a mistake in fact. . . .

"(2) The contract secured by the bond was broken. That contract was a severable contract to supply as many of 700,000 blocks as were ordered. . . . Under that contract, then, as secured by the bond, Otto Anderson owed the plaintiffs 604,000 blocks. To the extent of Otto's default the defendant is liable to plaintiffs on the bond."

Conceding these positions to be well taken, the case furnishes no evidence upon which to rest a judgment against the defendant upon the bond. Conceding that there was a failure to furnish 44,714 blocks, so as to constitute a breach of the bond, there is no evidence that such breach damaged the plaintiffs, or any claim that such shortage was an injury to them. The contract gave the plaintiffs the right, in case of such shortage, to purchase the blocks elsewhere at Otto's expense. The defendant's liability was to make up the excess between the price paid and the contract price. If the plaintiffs secured all they wanted at less than the contract, the breach was a benefit, not a damage, to them. In the absence of any evidence of damage recoverable under the bond, it is not useful to discuss the possibility of recovery if damage were shown.

contract secured by it was understood to be at an end. Absence of error in computation and settlement of their mutual accounts was not secured by the bond. If such had been understood to be the purpose of the bond, the exact phraseology of which does not appear, the plaintiffs would not have surrendered the document until the verity of their accounting had been demonstrated. The plaintiffs' obligation was to pay upon the acceptance of the blocks, the amount to be computed upon the count on the land, or aboard the cars. The bond was not, so far as appears, made to secure accuracy of count in either party. The plaintiffs could compute the number of blocks themselves before paying for them, or take Otto's account. They chose to take Otto's account, and settled on that basis. For this the defendant is not responsible.

The plaintiffs further contended that they are entitled to recover on their count for money had and received for the overpayment which they made, because such payment was caused by a mistake between the plaintiffs and Otto Anderson in settling their accounts. An action for money had and received "is an equitable action, and may, in general, be maintained whenever the defendant has money belonging to the plaintiff which in equity and good conscience he ought to refund to him." McDonald v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 68 N. H. 4, 6, 73 Am. St. Rep. 548, 38 Atl. 500. Can it be said that the case at bar is of this character? The overpayment was occasioned by reason of the plaintiffs' paying Otto for paving blocks that he did not deliver to them. Otto made returns to the plaintiffs, showing that he had delivered 138,100 blocks to the plaintiffs that had not been shipped. Relying on these returns the plaintiffs settled with him, paying $27.50 per thousand on the 138,100 blocks. Afterwards, when the plaintiffs counted the blocks, it was found that there was a shortage of 44,714.

The defendant had nothing to do with the settlement made between the plaintiffs and Otto. He was present when the final settlement was consummated between them, but he made no representations in reference to the number of blocks on hand, and knew nothing about it. The plaintiffs relied upon the returns and statements of Otto, which were honestly made, but turned out to be erroneous. The overpayment was made by checks which were payable to the defendant in accordance with the order given by Otto to plaintiffs when the contract was signed. The checks were made to the defendant, but the plaintiffs took a receipt for the checks from Otto. In legal effect the money was paid to Otto, and by him to the defendant. Atwell v. Jenkins, 163 Mass. 362, 28 L.R.A. 694, 47 Am. St. Rep. 463, 40 N. E. 178; Walker v. Conant, 69 Mich. 321, 13 Am. St. Rep. 391, 37 N. W. 292; Southwick v. First Nat. Bank, 84 N. Y. 420, 436.

The checks for the overpayment were rightly received by the defendant, and applied to the payment of Otto's debts and obligations, for some of which the defendant was holden, but the application of some of the money received from the overpayment may have been to pay Otto's pay roll and the running expenses of his business, for which the defendant was not holden. For it was the custom of the defendant, when he received payments from the plaintiffs, to return to Otto enough to pay his help and other current business expenses, and to apply the balance to Otto's debts. About the time the contract was made the defendant sold to Otto one half and leased the other half of his quarry, tools, buildings, and appliances. Otto owed the defendant from the inception of the contract until they settled, February 4, 1911, $1,500 directly, and he indorsed notes for Otto at the bank, upon which there was due on the above date some $1,300. When they made a settlement the defendant suffered a loss. The defendant's settlement with Otto of all matters between them was made months before the plaintiffs demanded that he should return to them the overpayment which they had made on account of the mistake between themselves and Otto. Under these circumstances the defendant cannot be compelled to refund to the plaintiffs the amount of the overpayment.

"When . . . a bill is paid to one who holds it in good faith and for value, he should not be called upon afterward to account for the money paid, perhaps at a distant time or place after the accounts with the drawers have been settled and closed, upon proof that in transactions between the drawees and drawers, of which the holder has no knowledge or means of knowledge, there has been some fraud, or wrong, or mistake, to the injury of the drawees." Southwick v. First Nat. Bank, supra; Justh v. National Bank, 56 N. Y. 478, 484; Goshen Nat. Bank v. State, 141 N. Y. 379, 385, 36 N. E. 316; Rankin v. Chase Nat. Bank, 188 U. S. 557, 565, 47 L. ed. 594, 597, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 372.

"To permit in every case of the payment of a debt an inquiry as to the source from which the debtor derived the money, and a recovery if shown to have been dishonestly acquired, would disorganize all business operations and entail an amount of risk and uncertainty which no enterprise could bear. The rule is founded upon L.R.A.1918C.

a sound general policy as well as upon that principle of justice which determines as between innocent parties upon whom the loss should fall under existing circumstances." Hatch v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 147 N. Y. 184, 191, 192, 41 N. E. 403; Gammon v. Butler, 48 Me. 344; Lime Rock Bank v. Plimpton, 17 Pick. 159, 28 Am. Dec. 286; Nassau Bank v. National Bank, 159 N. Y. 456, 54 N. E. 66.

"As between the payor and the payee there is no mistake which affects the validity of the transaction. One receiving money or negotiable securities in payment of or as security for an existing debt is not bound to inquire where the money or securities were obtained. It is better that money or a negotiable security, passing from hand to hand to one who rightly receives it for a valuable consideration, should carry on its face its own credentials." Spaulding v. Kendrick, 172 Mass. 71, 72, 51 N. E. 453.

The case of Merchants' Ins. Co. v. Abbott, 131 Mass. 397, is very similar to the present action. In that case the plaintiffs had insured Abbott's mill. The mill was burned, and the loss was adjusted; whereupon Abbott assigned to Denny, Rice, & Company, who are the real defendants in this action, the amount due upon such adjustment, which amount was paid to Denny, Rice, & Company in payment of a debt due to them from Abbott. More than a year afterwards the plaintiffs learned that the mill was burned with the knowledge and at the instigation of Abbott, and that his proofs of loss were false and fraudulent. Denny, Rice, & Company had no knowledge of any fraud, and were wholly innocent parties. It was held that the payment made to Denny, Rice, & Company could not be recovered back by the plaintiffs. In his opinion Gray, Ch. J., said: "The only contract of the plaintiffs was with Abbott, and the only mistake was as between them and him. The money was voluntarily paid by the plaintiffs in discharge of Abbott's supposed claim upon them under their policy, and to these defendants as the persons designated by Abbott to receive it, and was in legal effect a payment by the plaintiffs to Abbott. These defendants received the money, not in satisfaction of any promise which the plaintiffs had made to them (for the plaintiffs had made no such promise), but under the agreement of Abbott with these defendants that they might receive it from the plaintiffs and apply it to the satisfaction of Abbott's debt to themselves. In other words, the money was paid by the plaintiffs to these defendants, not as a sum which the latter were entitled to recover from the plaintiffs, but as a sum which the plaintiffs admitted to be due to Abbott, under their own contract with him, and which at his request and in his behalf they paid to these defendants, who, at the time of receiving it, knew no facts tending to show that it had not in truth become due from the plaintiffs to Abbott. This payment by the plaintiffs to these defendants at Abbott's request was a satisfaction of Abbott's debt to these defendants, and might have been so pleaded by him if sued by them upon that debt. . . . As between the plaintiffs and these defendants, there was no fraud, concealment, or mistake. These defendants had the right to receive from Abbott the sum which was paid to them. The assignment which they presented to the plaintiffs was genuine, and was all that it purported to be. They hold the money honestly, for value, with the right to retain it as their own, under a title derived from Abbott, and independent of the fraud practised by him upon the plaintiffs. The case stands just as if the money had been paid by the plaintiffs to Abbott, and by Abbott to these defendants, in which case there could be no doubt that, while the plaintiffs could recover back the amount from Abbott, neither Abbott nor the plaintiffs could recover the amount from these defendants. The fact that the money, instead of being paid by the plaintiffs to Abbott, and by Abbott to these defendants, was paid directly by the plaintiffs to these defendants, does not make any difference in the rights of the parties. The two forms do not differ in substance. In either case, Abbott alone is liable to the plaintiffs, and these defendants hold no money which ex æquo et bono they are bound to return either to Abbott or to the plaintiffs."

The defendant was not a party to the settlement between the plaintiffs and Otto. He received the money paid him by plaintiffs in good faith, and applied it to debts of Otto. He obtained title to the money rightfully, and cannot be required to repay it to the plaintiffs.

Exceptions overruled; judgment for defendant.

Annotation—Right to recover payment made to third person under a mistake as to the validity of the obligation of the payer to the party in whose behalf it was made.

The right of an agent to recover money erroneously paid to a third person is treated in a note in 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 363.

And the right of a bank to recover money paid on a check or other instrument drawn upon it or payable at it, under a mistaken belief that there were sufficient funds of the drawer to meet it, is treated in notes in 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1092, and 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1023.

As to the right to recover overpayments made in ignorance or forgetfulness of previous payments, see note in 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 517.

As to right of insurance company to recover back money paid in settlement of policy on life of one erroneously supposed to be dead, see note in 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 234.

The present note is limited to cases where one person, under the direction of his supposed creditor, pays a third person, under a mistake either as to the validity of his obligation or the amount thereof.

It is a general rule that where one person pays money to another by mistake as to the amount of the obligation or the validity thereof, and the circumstances of the payment do not constitute a waiver, he is entitled to recover the amount thus paid. Cases sustaining this general rule are not within the scope of this note. This rule, however, is limited to payments inter partes, and it does not apply where a debtor pays a third person the amount of his supposed indebtedness under a mistake as to the amount or validity thereof. As pointed out and held in WINSLOW v. ANDERSON, ante, 173, a payment to a third person in effect amounts to a payment by the debtor to his creditor, and a payment by the latter to the third person, or appointee; and the same rule applies as would apply had the money reached such third person in this manner. And of course it is clear that money cannot be followed in the hands of a third person on the ground that it was paid through fraud or mistake to another, who paid it to such third person. To this effect are:

—Ferguson v. Hirsch (1876) 54 Ind. 337, holding that where the surety on a bond pays money to a pledgee because of the latter's claim against the obligor, he cannot recover the same even though he was mistaken as to the validity of his obligation;

—Bissell v. Edwards (1811) 5 Day (Conn.) 94, holding that where an officer, in enforcing an execution, seized and sold the property of a third person for that of the execution debtor, and turned the proceeds of the sale over to the execution creditor, he could not recover from the latter the amount thus paid, although he was compelled to pay the true owner for the property he had seized and sold;

—Whitehurst v. Mason (1913) 140 Ga. 148, 78 S. E. 938, holding that where an insurance company paid instalments of insurance to a second assignee of the policy, and the first and second assignments were set aside on the ground of fraud in procuring the first assignment, and the insurance company was held liable to the original beneficiary for the entire amount of the policy, including instalments already paid to the second assignee, it could not recover from the latter such payment;

—Morrison v. Payton (1907) 31 Ky. L. Rep. 992, 104 S. W. 685, holding that where the owner of property paid a materialman the amount of his claim under the mistaken belief that he was owing that amount to the contractor, he cannot, upon subsequently ascertaining that he did not owe the amount, recover the payment. In this case, however, the owner had promised to pay for all material furnished for the property, and it was held that he was liable for the material even though he had paid the entire contract price for the construction of the buildings for which the material was furnished;

—Leavitt v. Leighton (1914) 219 Mass. 183, 106 N. E. 634, holding that where a person having control of the receipts of a business pays a claim contracted in the operation of the business under a mistaken belief that there were sufficient funds in his control to cover this claim, he cannot recover the payment even though the payee, before he cashed the check given in payment, knew that his debtor had ceased to have any interest in the account upon which the check was drawn;

—Moors v. Bird (1906) 190 Mass. 400, 77 N. E. 643, holding that where a bank was misled by the fraud of a depositor as to the amount due him, and paid at L.R.A.1918C.

his request a debt owing by him to another, upon subsequently learning of the fraud, it was not entitled to recover the amount thus paid from the person to whom the payment was made;

—Merchants' Ins. Co. v. Abbott (1881) 131 Mass. 397, holding that the payment by an insurance company of the amount of a policy to a creditor of the insured, under the latter's direction, amounted to a payment by the company to the insured and a payment by the latter to his creditor, and the company is not entitled to recover such payment, upon subsequently ascertaining that it did not owe the insured anything under the terms of the policy;

—Walker v. Conant (1888) 69 Mich. 321, 13 Am. St. Rep. 391, 37 N. W. 292, holding that the holder of a forged mortgage, who, by direction of the mortgagor, pays a portion of the proceeds of the loan to the holder of a prior forged mortgage,—neither mortgagee at the time knowing of the forgeries,—cannot recover such payment;

—Ball v. Shepard (1911) 202 N. Y. 247, 95 N. E. 719, holding that a bond broker who pays for bonds consigned to him c. o. d. for delivery to a purchaser cannot recover the amount paid on the ground that such payment was induced by the fraudulent representations of the purchaser, the seller not being a party thereto or having knowledge thereof;

—Belloff v. Dime Sav. Bank (1908) 118 App. Div. 20, 103 N. Y. Supp. 273, affirmed in (1908) 191 N. Y. 551, 85 N. E. 1106, holding that the purchaser of land, who pays a mortgage thereon, cannot recover the same upon ascertaining the lack of title in his grantor, although the mortgage he paid was void for the same reason;

—Southwick v. First Nat. Bank (1881) 84 N. Y. 420, holding that the fact that a drawee paid a draft to the payee under a mistake as to the purpose for which the proceeds of the draft were to be used by the drawer does not furnish ground for recovery from the payee of the amount paid;

—Aiken v. Short (1856) 1 Hurlst. & N. 210, 156 Eng. Reprint, 1180, 25 L. J. Exch. N. S. 321. 4 Week. Rep. 645, holding that where a subsequent mortgagee of the interest of the mortgagor in certain real estate under a will paid a prior mortgagee the amount of his lien, he was not entitled to recover such payment, although it subsequently turned out that, in consequence of a later will, the mortgagor had no interest therein, and hence neither mortgage was valid.

Compare with Guild v. Baldrige (1852) 2 Swan (Tenn.) 295, holding that where the creditor does not suffer prejudice by reason of the payment of a debt to him by a third person, it is wholly immaterial as respects the right to recover the same whether the payment by mistake was to the original creditor or to a third person claiming to be a creditor of the latter. The plaintiff's right is precisely the same in either case, and he is entitled to recover the amount thus paid.

And see also Strauss v. Hensey (1896) 9 App. D. C. 541, holding that where an innocent person was defrauded in making a loan on land by a person impersonating the owner, but was subsequently repaid the loan by another innocent person likewise defrauded, the latter was entitled to recover from the former the amount paid him. The court said that the case was fully within the principle that where money is paid by mistake, neither party being in fault, the party making the payment may recover it as money paid without consideration.

Where a draft drawn upon one person was mistakenly presented by a collector to another, who paid it as his own obligation, after subsequently ascertaining his mistake he is entitled to recover the amount paid. Koontz v. Booneville Cent. Nat. Bank (1873) 51 Mo. 275; Munroe v. Bonanno (1897) 16 App. Div. 421, 45 N. Y. Supp. 61.

So, where the purchaser of goods was directed by the seller to remit the purchase price to a certain bank, which had an equitable mortgage on the goods, and by mistake he remitted the amount to another bank, which also had a claim against the seller, this constituted a mistake of fact entitling the purchaser to recover the amount thus remitted. Continental Caoutchouc & Gutta Percha Co. v. Kleinwort Sons & Co. (1904) 90 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 474, 52 Week. Rep. 489, 20 Times L. R. 403, 9 Com. Cas. 240; Kleinwort Sons & Co. v. Dunlop Rubber Co. (1907) 97 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 263, 23 Times L. R. 696.

If the person receiving the payment knows of the mistake and induces the payment, he is not entitled to retain the money.

For example, where the buyer paid the purchase price to the creditor of the seller upon condition that the creditor guarantee the delivery of the goods purchased, and the creditor knew of this condition before he received and appropriated the money, and further knew that the seller was insolvent and could not deliver the goods, he was liable to the buyer for the amount received. Ketelson v. Groos (1899) 21 Tex. Civ. App. 31, 50 S. W. 591.

So, where materialmen, at the request of the contractor, drew on the owner of the property upon which the buildings were being erected for more than the amount due for material furnished, but recited in the draft that the sum was to cover material furnished, and, upon receiving the proceeds of the draft, they paid the excess to the contractor, they were liable to the owner for the amount of the excess thus paid to them. Caldwell v. Maxfield (1895) 7 S. D. 361, 64 N. W. 166. A. G. S.

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a nonsuit granted by the Supreme Court in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the minor plaintiff through the alleged negligence of defendant. Affirmed.

Note. — The duty of a store or shopkeeper toward a customer as to the condition of his premises is treated in the notes to McDermott v. Sallaway, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 456, and Smith v. Johnson, L.R.A.1915F, 572; and

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William Pennington, Charles C. Pilgrim, and Fredric C. Ritger for appellants.

Messrs. Edward T. Magoffin, Martin Conboy, and Edwin N. Moore for appellee.

Walker, Ch., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by a son and his father for damages for injuries sustained by the son through the alleged negligence of the defendant.

The facts are these: On November 30, 1915, Charles Fleckenstein, Jr., aged about twelve years, accompanied his friend, Anthony Young, who was about fifteen years of age, into defendant's store. Young intended to make purchases, and did so, but Fleckenstein did not intend to buy anything, in fact bought nothing, and merely accompanied his friend on the latter's business. While Young was being waited on the store manager directed a boy to open a box of pork and beans. The opening of the box was in nowise connected with Young's purchases, and neither Young nor Fleckenstein had any interest whatever in the box. At this time Fleckenstein was standing beside Young, and the box was about 3 feet away from him. He was watching the boy who was stooping down to open the box on the side away from Fleckenstein. The boy proceeded to pry off the lid by inserting a hatchet under it and by striking the hatchet head with a hammer. While this was being done a fragment of metal flew into Fleckenstein's eye and destroyed the sight. At the close of the plaintiff's case the court granted a motion for nonsuit.

The question arises, Was the infant plaintiff lawfully upon defendant's premises, and, if so, was he an invitee or licensee? In our judgment he was lawfully in the store of the defendant, not as an invitee, however, but only as a licensee.

Merchants invite the public to enter their stores to buy wares. It cannot be said that they invite the entrance of those who accompany them, but who have no intention of purchasing; such persons are mere licensees. While it may be that they invite those to enter, who, after inspecting their wares, may become purchasers, such an invitation did not extend to young Fleckenstein, when he accompanied his friend Young into the store, as he (Fleckenstein) admittedly had no intention of purchasing anything.

This court in Saunders v. Smith Realty Co. 84 N. J. L. 276, said, at page 279, 86 Atl. 405, that where the use of property is permissive, "the owner is under no obligation to them [the users] except to abstain from acts which are wilfully injurious." In Fitzpatrick v. Cumberland Glass Mfg. Co. 61 N. J. L. 378, 39 Atl. 675, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 193, the supreme court held that the owner of lands is under no obligation to keep them in a safe condition for the use of a person who comes upon them not by the invitation of the owner, but merely by his permission. And this court in Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Reich, 61 N. J. L. 635, at page 643, 41 L.R.A. 831, 68 Am. St. Rep. 727, 40 Atl. 685, held: "The general rule with regard to the duty which a landowner owes to persons coming upon his premises is that where the entry is made by his invitation, either express or implied, he is required to use reasonable care to have his premises in a safe condition; but that where the entry is made merely by his permission . . . the landowner is under no obligation to keep his premises in a nonhazardous state: his only duty to a licensee or a trespasser is to abstain from acts wilfully injurious. And this rule has been frequently enforced by the courts of this state. Phillips v. Library Co. 55 N. J. L. 307, 27 Atl. 478; Mathews v. Bensel, 51 N. J. L. 30, 16 Atl. 30; Vanderbeck v. Hendry, 34 N. J. L. 467; Fitzpatrick v. Cumberland Glass Mfg. Co. supra; Turess v. New York S. & W. R. Co. 61 N. J. L. 314, 40 Atl. 614, supra."

There is no pretense in the matter before us that the infant plaintiff was injured by a wilful act of any of the defendant company's employees, and that is entirely dispositive of the case. The judgment of nonsuit was right, and must be affirmed.

Pleading — allegation of agency.

1. Under § 4759, Okla. Rev. ERROR to the District Court for Oklahoma County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover the amount due on a promissory note and to foreclose a mortgage given to secure it. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Kroeger & King, Charles West, Joseph L. Hull, and Horace H. Hagan, for plaintiff in error:

The pleadings do not show that defendant Sweatt was authorized to make a tender so as to compel plaintiff to accept. He is a stranger to the mortgage and does not plead that he has assumed it.

Authority to loan or collect interest does not show authority to collect principal, so that a tender could be made to him.

8 per cent interest per annum, and to secure the same they executed their mortgage on certain real estate in Oklahoma City, the mortgage providing, among other things, for payment of 10 per cent attorneys' fees if suit should be commenced thereon. At the maturity of the note, June 11, 1909, the interest was paid to date, and the time of payment extended six months at the same rate of interest. At the time the interest was paid, the note and mortgage were in the possession of the American National Bank of Oklahoma City, and the payment of interest and extension of time was made by and through the bank. At the second maturity of the note, which was December 11, 1911, or within a few days thereafter, defendant W. H. Sweatt tendered to C. W. Brooks the sum of $1,040.87, as payment in full of said mortgage, which was refused by Brooks, as he then stated, for the reason that he demanded $100 attorneys' fees, in addition to the amount due on the mortgage. It appears that the tender covered the full amount due at the time, and the trial court found as a fact that suit had not been commenced at the time the tender was made.

This action was commenced to recover judgment on the note and decree of foreclosure of the mortgage. The petition is the usual form, with exhibits attached, and alleges that the defendants Minetta Sweatt and W. H. Sweatt, husband and wife, claim to have some right or interest in the said premises covered by the mortgage of this plaintiff, but plaintiff states that, whatever said interest may be, the same is junior and inferior and subject to the rights of this plaintiff under said mortgage, and asks that said defendants be summoned to appear and set forth their interest in said property, if any they have, and that such interest, if any, be sold to satisfy the claims of this plaintiff under said mortgage.

Plaintiff prays judgment against all the defendants for $1,050 and $105 attorneys' fees, and for foreclosure of the mortgage. It appears that the petition was filed on the 14th day of December, 1911, and on the 29th day of April, 1913, the defendants Fenimore answered, admitting the execution of the note and mortgage, and that there is due on the note the sum of $1,040.87, but deny that they are indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,050.

On the 19th day of May, 1913, the defendants filed their first amended answer as follows: (1) By a general denial, except as to such matters as are admitted; (2) they admit the execution of the note sued on; (3) deny that they are indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $1,050 for principal and interest thereon; and (5) further allege that the defendants were, on the 14th day of December, 1911, indebted upon said note for the principal thereof and interest to the date accrued in the aggregate sum of $1,040.87, and no more; (6) that on the 14th day of December, 1911, defendant W. H. Sweatt tendered to C. W. Brooks, the authorized agent of Anna Knudson, the sum of $1,040.87, which the plaintiff, through her agent, C. W. Brooks, refused to receive; (7) they tender said amount in open court, and ask that the plaintiff have judgment for said sum and no more; (8) they pray that they be not adjudged indebted upon said note and mortgage beyond the sum admitted, and that they have such other and further relief as they may be entitled to in equity. On the 20th day of December, 1913, defendants filed their second amended answer: (1) By general denial, except as to such matters as are admitted; (2) admit the execution of the note and mortgage; (3) deny that they are indebted to plaintiff, in the sum of $1,050 for principal and interest thereon; (4) admit they were, on or about the 14th day of December, 1911, indebted upon said note for the principal thereof and interest to that time accrued, in the aggregate sum of $1,040.87, and no more; (5) the defendants for their further answer allege that between the 11th and 14th day of December, 1911, the defendant W. H. Sweatt, tendered to C. W. Brooks, the authorized agent of Anna Knudson, the sum of $1,040.87, which the plaintiff, through her agent, C. W. Brooks, refused to receive; that in making said tender these defendants did not require of C. W. Brooks, the agent of plaintiff, that he deliver to said defendants the note and mortgage sued on, that he give a receipt for same, or that he do anything except receive the money. Defendants pray that they be not adjudged indebted upon said note and mortgage beyond the sum admitted as herein set forth, and further pray that the plaintiff be denied the right to foreclose said mortgage, but that the said mortgage be ordered canceled and held for naught, and for such other and further relief as the court may deem just and proper.

For reply to defendants' answer, plaintiff admits the correct amount due on the note to be $1,040.87, and prays for judgment and decree as alleged in the petition.

On these issues the case was tried to the court, and judgment rendered against all the defendants for the amount due on the note, foreclosure refused, and the mortgage canceled. From this judgment plaintiff appeals to this court.

The first contention of counsel for plaintiff is that C. W. Brooks was not the agent of the plaintiff at the time the tender was made. From the evidence we would be inclined to favor that view of the case, but the answer alleges that he was the authorized agent of the plaintiff, and that allegation is not denied under oath, and therefore must be taken as admitted.

It is a well-settled rule in this state, under § 4759, Rev. Laws 1910, that a general allegation of authorized agency will be presumed to be an agency with full powers legally conferred, and the failure to deny such allegation under oath is equivalent to an admission in the answer, and no further proof of the agent's authority is required. Mitchell v. Knudston Land Co. 19 N. D. 736, 124 N. W. 946; Thomas J. Baird Invest. Co. v. Harris, 126 C. C. A. 217, 209 Fed. 297.

Several other grounds for reversal are presented and earnestly argued by counsel; but, as we look at the case, it will only be necessary to consider one of them, which is that neither the allegations nor the proof show that W. H. Sweatt was authorized to make such a tender as to effect or create a discharge of the mortgage. That instrument was executed by the Fenimores. In their separate answer they expressly admit the execution of the note and do not deny the execution of the mortgage, which is equivalent to an admission. They also admit the sum of $1,040.87 was due thereon, on the 14th day of December, 1911, and pray that they be adjudged to pay that amount. The defendants Fenimore do not admit the authority of W. H. Sweatt to make a tender for them. So far as their separate answer goes, they are the only persons interested in the matter, and all other persons would seem to be interlopers. It is true, the plaintiff's petition alleges that the defendants Sweatt claim to have some interest in the premises covered by the mortgage, and plaintiff prays that they be summoned to appear and make known their interest in said property, if they have any, but in their several answers they fail, neglect, or refuse to state what interest they have in said property, and in fact do not claim that they have any interest therein, either personal, or as the agents of the mortgagors. Even if we admit, as a matter of fact, that Brooks was the agent of the plaintiff, and had perfect right to collect the money, there is no allegation, and no evidence whatever tending to show, that he knew, or had any reason to believe, that Sweatt had any interest in the transaction at the time the tender was made, either as principal or agent. Counsel for defendants may claim that the answers allege, and therefore show, that the defendants Sweatt admit their liability on the note, or rather for the debt secured by the mortgage, but it must not be overlooked that the first answer was filed by the Fenimores only, fifteen months after the petition was filed, and no such confession or statement is found therein. The first admission of the Sweatts as to their liability for the debt is found in the answer of all the defendants on the 19th day of May, 1913, eighteen months after tender was made. This is the first intimation or notice that the plaintiff, or her alleged agent, Brooks, had of the fact that the Sweatts made any pretensions of liability for the debt, and the answer in that particular is indefinite, uncertain, and amounts simply to a conclusion, if anything, but certainly nothing more. They admit the defendants are indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $1,040.80, but do not say which defendants,—a sort of hit it if it's a deer, and miss it if it's a calf, admission. There is no reason or equity in the contention that the defendants brought themselves, or the plaintiff, within the harsh rule that a refusal by a creditor of a tender of the amount due on a debt secured by mortgage or other lien operates to relinquish and discharge the lien, when made by the proper person, to the creditor or his agent duly authorized to receive the same.

Leaving out the question of the agency of Brooks, there is nothing in this case that even tends to show that Wm. H. Sweatt brought himself within the rule authorizing him to make this binding tender. The most that can possibly be said is that there is some intimation in the evidence that his wife was sometime, for some purpose unknown, the grantee of the Fenimores, but there is nothing to show that the plaintiff, Brooks, knew of that claim at the time the tender was made, nor until it came out in the evidence at the trial more than two years after the tender. The rule as laid down in 2 Jones on Mortgages, §§ 895 et seq., is that a tender of a mortgage debt, in order to extinguish the mortgage lien, must be made by one having the right to make it, and cannot be made by a stranger, and that "a mere stranger has no right to tender money to discharge an encumbrance on the property, or redeem it." One of the earliest cases in this country, holding that a tender of the money due on a mortgage discharges the lien, is Kortright v. Cady, 21 N. Y. 343, 78 Am. Dec. 145. In a later case the supreme court of New York (Harris v. Jex, 66 Barb. 237) says:

"In the case of Kortright v. Cady, supra, it was held that a tender of the money due on a mortgage discharged the lien, although the tender was not subsequently kept good. It is plain that this is a somewhat harsh principle, and it should not be pressed beyond its strict limits. It rests upon the familiar doctrine that the bond is the principal, and the mortgage is the collateral. Now while this is the legal principle, yet in modern times and in the common understanding of men, a contrary view prevails. It is the security on the land, and not the responsibility of the debtor, to which men look in taking mortgages. The facility of transferring real estate and mortgages results frequently in ignoring the original mortgagor and treating the lien on the land as the only thing of real value. To hold, then, that a mere tender, without actual payment, is a discharge of the lien, may sometimes operate very unjustly. It is important, then, to inquire who has the right to make a tender which shall have this very serious effect. To ascertain this, it may be well to examine the authorities cited in Kortright v. Cady. The first is that of Jackson ex dem. Bowers v. Crafts, 18 Johns. 110. In that case the party who made the tender, on its refusal, deposited the money tendered with another person, to be delivered to the mortgagee, so that there was more than a mere tender. In Merritt v. Lambert, 7 Paige, 344, the tender was made by the mortgagor; but the chancellor held that the lien was not discharged. In Edwards v. Farmers' F. Ins. & Loan Co. 21 Wend. 467, and id., 26 Wend. 541, the tender was by the mortgagor. The case of Arnot v. Post, 6 Hill, 65, in which the tender was made by a purchaser under a sheriff's deed, was reversed in 2 Denio, 344. In the case of Kortright v. Cady the tender was made by the holder of the equity of redemption. Whether or not he had assumed a personal liability to pay the debt does not appear. But the reasoning in that case is throughout based on the right of the mortgagor to pay his debt. And the court constantly speak of the right to make a tender as belonging to the debtor. Thus, at page 366 of 21 N. Y., 78 Am. Dec. 145: 'The mortgagor has the same right after as before a default to pay his debt and so clear his estate from encumbrances.' 'Tender is equivalent to payment as to all things which are incidental and accessorial to the debt.'

"Now certainly it would not be claimed that a mere stranger to the contract could make a tender of the debt to the creditor which would have any validity. And such a tender,—that is, a tender made by a mere stranger,—if refused, could not have the effect of 'payment as to all things which are incidental and accessorial to the debt.' It is important to keep this in view; that is, that a tender cannot be made by a mere stranger to the contract, so as to oblige the creditor to accept it.

equity of redemption who has not assumed the debt personally? He has just what the name which designates him implies: the equity of redemption. That is, he has the right to redeem the land from the lien. But how is the land to be redeemed from the lien of the mortgage? Not, I suppose, by a mere tender which is not kept good, but by actual payment, or by bringing the money into court for the purpose of payment. The mere owner of the equity of redemption owes no debt. It cannot be said in respect to him, as it is said in Kortright v. Cady, supra: 'The creditor, by refusing to accept, does not forfeit his right to the very thing tendered, but he does lose all collateral benefits and securities.' For the creditor, if he refuses to take the money from the owner of the equity of redemption, cannot recover it from him. It is the redemption of a lien, not the payment of a debt, which his tender is to accomplish. There is no debt, at least from him, and therefore, as it seems to me, his mere tender does not discharge the mortgage lien. He has the right to redeem; but he must redeem by actual payment.

"But there is a further consideration. The equity of redemption was, in this case, conveyed subject to the payment of the mortgages. The land was thereby made the primary fund for payment. The original debtor has become a quasi surety, having a right to insist on the enforcement of the debt out of the land. The holder of the equity of redemption cannot even dispute the validity of the mortgage. Freeman v. Auld, 44 N. Y. 50. The land, or so much as is necessary, is (as it were) appropriated to the payment of the mortgages. If, therefore, under such circumstances, the owner of the equity of redemption were permitted to discharge the lien by a mere tender without payment, great injury would be done. For instance, in the present case Jex took the land subject to the mortgages. It is reasonable to suppose that in so doing he deducted their amount from the value of the land agreed upon. The land, then, is primarily liable for the debt. That is, Poillon has a right to insist upon the collection of the debt first out of the land. Now if by a mere tender Jex has discharged the lien, then all the rights of the mortgagee seem to have gone. He cannot sue Jex, for Jex never assumed the debt. He cannot enforce the lien, for that, by the supposition, is discharged. He cannot sue Poillon, for by the discharge of the primary fund Poillon, who has become a quasi surety, must be released. The result is that Jex retains the whole of the mortgage for which he has paid nothing, and the mortgagee loses his debt. Unless the clearest principles of law require it, we ought not to work out such injustice."

We quote this case fully for the purpose of fixing the fact that under this harsh rule the tender must be made by the proper party, and it necessarily follows that if made by an actually authorized party, the tenderer is entitled to know that fact at the time the tender is made; otherwise, how could he possibly, in justice, be bound by the tender? We therefore lay this down as a positive rule that at the time the tender is made, if not made by the original mortgagor, it must clearly and unequivocally be made known to the tenderer that the tenderer is a person having the legal right to make the tender, and that all the rights of the mortgagor will be protected by an acceptance of the money and the discharge of the mortgage. In Sinclair v. Learned, 51 Mich. 339, 16 N. W. 674, the supreme court of Iowa says: "The tender proposed to be proved appears to have been made by the plaintiff. The objection to it was that the plaintiff was not in position to make it. He was not mortgagor or the grantee of the mortgagor, or in any manner, at that time, interested in the equity of redemption.

. . . There was no offer to show that the tender was made for, or in the interest or at the request of, the mortgagor. It was therefore made by one who, as between the mortgagor and mortgagee, was a stranger to their dealings, and an intermeddler. Nothing is plainer than that such a person has no right of redemption. If the mortgagee had accepted the money, he could not afterwards have claimed rights under the mortgage; but it is assumed that he refused it, and this he clearly had a right to do."

In the sixth syllabus of McDougald v. Dougherty, 11 Ga. 570, it is said: "A tender, to be a bar, should be made by the debtor or his legal representative, and not by a stranger." The opinion of the court fully sustains the doctrine.

In Mahler v. Newbaur, 32 Cal. 168, 91 Am. Dec. 571, the headnotes are as follows:

"A party having no interest in the mortgaged premises or in the tender made has no right to make a tender on his own behalf of the amount due on the mortgage.

"When a tender of the amount due on a mortgage is made by a stranger, and not the party in interest, the creditor must be informed on whose behalf it is made; and, if not so informed, the tender is invalid."

In the body of the opinion they fully and completely sustain the rule herein laid down.

In a very recent case, Brunswick Realty Co. v. University Invest. Co. 43 Utah, 75, 143 Pac. 608, the court says: "In no event can the appellant insist that, as the purchaser of the equity of redemption, without assuming payment of the debt, it could, by its tender, discharge the premises from the mortgage lien. The appellant was a stranger to the contract between the trust company and the Carpenters, its grantors, and hence the only effect the tender would have would be to stop interest on the debt and to prevent the recovery of costs and attorneys' fees."

Hunt on Tender, in § 373, uses the following language: "A tender by a mere stranger will not discharge the lien of a mortgage. Where mortgaged premises are conveyed to a purchaser subject to a mortgage, but without any assumption of the debt by him, a tender by such owner of the equity of redemption will not discharge the lien. As between the mortgagor and the purchaser of the legal estate, the mortgage debt is part of the consideration, and the land is the primary fund for the payment of the mortgage debt. Hence a purchaser cannot be permitted to discharge the lien of the mortgage by a mere tender without payment. If he desires to pay the mortgage debt so as to free his land, and the mortgagee refuses the money, he has his remedy in equity to compel a discharge of the mortgage, and, by keeping the tender good and bringing the money into court for the purpose of the payment, he stops the running of the interest, and subjects the mortgagee to the costs of the suit. Or in a suit to foreclose he may plead the tender as a defense and bring the money into court with like effect."

In Grafflin v. State, 103 Md. 171, 63 Atl. 373, 7 Ann. Cas. 1061, one of the headnotes is as follows: "In order to extinguish the lien of a mortgage by a tender of the amount due at maturity and its refusal by the mortgagee, the tender must be made by a person who has a right to pay the debt; such as the debtor himself, or the holder of the title to the property mortgaged, or the holder of some subsequent lien having an equity of redemption. The tender of the debt by a stranger does not extinguish the lien of the mortgage."

In the body of the case the court states its reasons for so holding in the following language: "In the first place, the plea does not aver that the guaranty company was the owner of the equity of redemption in the mortgaged property, or that the company occupied any other relation to the property or the liens upon it that would entitle it to tender to the holder of the first mortgage the amount due thereon. The plea sets up simply the fact that the guaranty company, a mere stranger, tendered to the holder of the first mortgage the amount due thereon, whereby, upon the holder's refusal to accept payment, the lien of the first mortgage was extinguished and the second mortgage thereupon became the first mortgage. It may be conceded that if there is a tender of the mortgage money at the time and in the manner prescribed in the condition of the mortgage, and the mortgagee refuses to receive it, the condition is complied with and the mortgagee must lose his security upon the land, which was merely collateral to the debt, although the mortgagor may be still liable for the money. Merritt v. Lambert, 7 Paige, 344; 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 13. But to produce such a result the money really due must be tendered by a person having a right to make the tender, because a valid tender can only be made by the person, or the agent of the person, who has a right to pay the debt; as the debtor himself or his representatives, or the holder of the title to the estate or property on which the debt is a lien, or the holder of some subsequent lien having an equity of redemption; a tender by a stranger is not good. 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 34."

From the foregoing it must be apparent that no such tender was made as would effect a discharge of the mortgage lien.

By their answer the defendants confessed the amount of $1,040.87 to be due on the note on the 14th day of December, 1911. That admission should be accepted by the court as the true amount due at that time, and was the amount for which judgment and decree of foreclosure should have been rendered, and the court committed error in not so doing. The judgment of the trial court should therefore be reversed and remanded to the District Court of Oklahoma County, with directions to that court to set aside its judgment therein and enter judgment against the defendants for the sum of $1,040.87, with interest thereon at 8 per cent from the 19th day of May, 1913, and further decreeing said mortgage to be a prior lien on the property involved, and that the same be foreclosed and the property ordered sold, as provided by law, for the payment of said indebtedness, and that said court, in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction, disallow the claims of plaintiff for attorneys' fees.

Annotation—Who may make a tender which will discharge the lien of a mortgage.

It is a rule that the tender of the amount due on a mortgage discharges the lien thereof. This rule has been discussed in detail in this series of reports.<sup>1</sup> By reference to the above note it will be seen that the mortgage is discharged by such a tender, if made at maturity, whether or not the tender has been kept good. Where the tender is made after maturity there is some difference of opinion as to the necessity of keeping it good. The tender under this rule is not, therefore, the ordinary tender made to stop the running of interest or the accrual of costs, which it is necessary to keep good. The present note is concerned with one of the phases of the general rule first herein referred to, viz., the person by whom such tender must be made to effect a discharge of the lien of the mortgage. A tender for the purpose of discharging the lien of a mortgage must be distinguished from a tender for the purpose of acquiring some rights in the mortgage itself, or for the purpose of redemption. It has been stated that "an offer of money by a subsequent encumbrancer for the purpose of acquiring a prior encumbrance, or as a step preparatory to a bill to redeem, is quite different in its spirit and equitable bearing" from a tender of the money in the sense of an offer made and understood as one to cancel the lien of the former mortgage.<sup>2</sup> Where the party making the tender fails to make it clear that he intends to pay the mortgage and cancel the lien, he cannot insist that the lien is discharged by a refusal of the tender, especially where the mortgagee has reason to believe that his purpose is to secure a transfer of the securities to himself and hold them against the mortgaged premises.<sup>3</sup> This, however, goes to the sufficiency of the tender rather than to the person who may make it, and is therefore not within the scope of this discussion.

tion with the present question have been discussed in this series of reports.<sup>4</sup>

It seems clear that the mortgagor may make the tender so long as he remains the owner of the property. It has been stated that a tender "must be made by the owner of the mortgaged property, or someone acting by his authority or in his interest; for, as it has often been said, the right to redeem is inseparable from the ownership of the property."<sup>5</sup> As will appear in subsequent parts of this note, however, parties other than the owner are held, at least in some jurisdictions, to have the right to make a tender which will discharge the lien of the mortgage. As hereafter pointed out, in some jurisdictions, even the owner of the mortgaged property is not entitled to make such tender if he be a purchaser of the property after the mortgage was given, without having assumed payment of the mortgage. The real question is as to who, other than the mortgagor, may make the tender.

It has been stated generally that any party who has an interest in the mortgaged property may make the tender.<sup>6</sup> But the interest which entitles the holder to make a tender must, it seems, be one subject to the mortgage. Accordingly, the holder of a tax title which is not subject to the mortgage has been held not entitled to make a tender.<sup>7</sup> The court states that the holder of the tax title "was not mortgagor, or the grantee of the mortgagor, or in any manner at that time interested in the equity of redemption. He had tax titles, it is true, but these were not subject to the mortgage. There was no offer to show that the tender was made for or in the interest or at the request of the mortgagor. It was therefore made by one who, as between the mortgagor and mortgagee, was a stranger to their dealings and an intermeddler. Nothing is plainer than that such a person has no right of redemption."

It is recognized in all the cases that a stranger cannot make the tender which will discharge the lien of the mortgage.<sup>8</sup> If the stranger makes the tender on behalf of a party, it is not good where the mortgagee is not informed of the party in whose behalf it is made.<sup>9</sup> But if the mortgagee does understand the relation of a stranger to the mortgaged property, a tender need not necessarily be made by the mortgagor.<sup>10</sup> The fact that the mortgagee supposed the tender to be made on behalf of a party who was entitled to make it does not aid the tender when it was in fact made on behalf of a party other than the one supposed.<sup>11</sup>

According to the better considered cases, a purchaser of land subject to a mortgage who has not assumed payment of the mortgage debt is not entitled to make a tender which will discharge the lien of the mortgage.<sup>12</sup> The reasoning upon which this conclusion is reached is very clearly set forth in the opinion in KNUDSON v. FENIMORE, ante, 181, and extracts from the opinions of other courts and text-writers contained therein, and amounts in brief to this: viz., that the purchaser who has not assumed payment of the mortgage owes no debt to the mortgagee; hence the mortgagee, if he refuse the tender, cannot recover the debt from such purchaser; the right which such purchaser has is to discharge the lien of the mortgage, either by actual payment or by bringing the money into court for the purpose of payment. In the case of a chattel mortgage securing a debt that is payable on demand, the right of one who has purchased the mortgaged property subject to the existing lien, but who has not assumed the payment thereof, to make a tender, has been denied. The court states: "Nor am I able to see, under the evidence and findings of the referee, that the plaintiff had the right to make a legal and valid tender of the debt for which the chattel mortgage was security. Clearly a tender of the debt before it was due would be ineffectual to destroy the security. The debt was payable on demand and would be due either on the demand of the defendant or on the tender of the debtor. The plaintiff did not assume payment of the debt in purchasing the property, and took upon himself no duty or obligation in reference thereto. So far as the contract between Fitzgerald and defendant is concerned, he is an entire stranger."<sup>13</sup> The court again refers to the fact that the debt was not due at the time of the tender, and continues by saying that, in view of all the facts, "we think the plaintiff was not in a position to perform the condition of the mortgage by a tender of the debt, and nothing short of absolute payment by him and acceptance by the creditor could vest him with the title to the property." Such a purchaser has been held to be a stranger to the transaction.<sup>14</sup>

But where such purchaser has, as part of the contract of purchase, assumed payment of the mortgage, he may make the tender; such a purchaser is not a stranger.<sup>15</sup>

It has been assumed in a number of cases that a purchaser of the mortgaged property may make a tender which will discharge the lien of the mortgage. The court in these cases has not considered whether the purchaser assumed payment of the mortgage. The facts are such that the cases cannot be regarded as direct authority upon the question, but as they have a bearing upon it they have been included herein.<sup>16</sup> It has been held that a purchaser of the mortgagor's title and appeals in (1874) 55 N. Y. 421, 14 Am. Rep. 285, but the tender was held insufficient upon other grounds, and the court expressly states it to be unnecessary to decide whether the purchaser might make the tender.

Harris v. Jex (1873) 66 Barb. (N. Y.) 232, was followed in Frost v. Yonkers Sav. Bank (1876) 8 Hun (N. Y.) 26, affirmed without deciding this point in (1877) 70 N. Y. 553, 26 Am. Rep. 627, in case of a tender by a junior mortgagee.

Although the court of appeals in affirming Harris v. Jex did not decide the right of a purchaser of the mortgaged property to make the tender, see opinion in Noyes v. Wyckoff (N. Y.) infra.

Brunswick Realty Co. v. University Invest. Co. (1913) 43 Utah, 75, 134 Pac. 608. Such a purchaser is a stranger to the contract.

See discussion in KNUDSON v. FENIMORE, ante, 181.

A tender by a purchaser of mortgaged premises of the amount of the mortgage was held insufficient for other reasons in Smith v. Mould (1914) 87 Misc. 199, 149 N. Y. Supp. 552, and the right of the purchaser to make the tender was not considered.

in (1877) 70 N. Y. 553, 26 Am. Rep. 627, without reference to this point, holding a tender by a junior mortgagee insufficient.

<sup>15</sup> Loftis v. Alexander (1913) 139 Ga. 346, 77 S. E. 169, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 718, holding the purchaser of land subject to "a loan deed," which such purchaser assumed, entitled to make a tender to the holder of the loan deed. The court states that "in this state a deed to secure a debt is not the same as a mortgage. Such a deed conveys title. A mortgage is only a lien. But a deed of that character is in several particulars similar to a common-law mortgage; and one of them is as to the right of one who buys the property from the maker of the deed, and obtains an equitable interest therein, to protect his purchase by paying off the secured loan; especially where, as part of the contract of purchase, he agrees to make such payment."

<sup>16</sup> In Johnston v. Gray (1827) 16 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 361, 16 Am. Dec. 577, in holding a tender by a purchaser of mortgaged premises good, the court states that "as a purchaser, whose title was on record, he had a right to tender and redeem." The exact bearing of the tender in this case is not altogether clear.

A tender by a purchaser from the mortgagor was treated as valid in Jackson ex dem. Bowers v. Crafts (1820) 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 110, but the dispute in that case was as to whether the tender was made to the right interest at an execution sale of that interest may tender the amount of a prior mortgage to the mortgagee, and, the tender being kept good, the lien of the mortgage is divested, and the purchaser entitled to possession.<sup>17</sup>

It has usually been held that a second mortgagee may make a tender which will discharge the lien of a mortgage.<sup>18</sup> "No distinction is perceived as to the effect of a tender," says the court in one case, "between that of a mortgagor to a mortgagee, and of a subsequent encumbrancer to the same party to redeem. In each case the effect is to discharge the lien of the mortgage on the mortgaged premises, and if tender discharges the lien in one case, it ought to have the same effect in another."<sup>19</sup> It has been stated that an assignee of a second mortgagee is entitled to make the tender.<sup>20</sup> But a surety on the official bond of the second mortgagee is not entitled to make the tender;<sup>21</sup> nor can a purchaser at a foreclosure of a junior mortgage make the tender when his relation to the property does not appear to the mortgagee.<sup>22</sup> One court, in discussing this case, states person, no question being raised as to the person by whom it was made. See New York cases, supra.

A tender by a purchaser of chattels to the mortgagee was held to discharge the mortgage in Thomas v. Seattle Brewing & Malting Co. (1908) 48 Wash. 560, 15 L.R.A. (N. S.) 1164, 125 Am. St. Rep. 945, 94 Pac. 116, 15 Ann. Cas. 494, but there was no question as to the proper person to make the tender.

The court in Murray v. O'Brien (1909) 56 Wash. 361, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 998, 105 Pac. 840, regards the purchaser of an undivided interest in the mortgaged property as entitled to make the tender, but the tender in this case was held ineffectual to discharge the lien of the mortgage for other reasons.

In Rice v. Kahn (1887) 70 Wis. 323, 35 N. W. 465, a tender by an agent of a purchaser of chattels was treated as good without any discussion.

A tender by a purchaser of part of the mortgaged premises was held to stop interest in Brown v. Simons (1864) 45 N. H. 211.

A purchaser of one of two lots upon which deeds of trust had been given to secure two notes has no right to demand, as a condition of his tender of the amount due on one of the notes, that a release should be executed discharging the lot purchased by him from liability for the remainder due upon the other note. Flake v. Nuse (1879) 51 Tex. 98. See references to note in 33 L.R.A. 231, contained in note 18, infra.

A purchaser of a partnership interest in a stock of goods was held to have the right to make a tender of the amount due on a pledge of the goods in Summers v. Heard (1909) 66 Ark. 550, 50 S. W. 78, 51 S. W. 1057.

<sup>18</sup> Hull v. Godfrey (1891) 31 Neb. 204, 47 N. W. 850 (chattel mortgage). But see contra, Frost v. Yonkers Sav. Bank (1876) 8 Hun (N. Y.) 26, affirmed in (1877) 70 N. Y. 553, 26 Am. Rep. 627, supra.

It is stated obiter in Sager v. Tupper (1876) 35 Mich. 134, that if a second mortgagee had made an absolute tender to the first mortgagee, who had foreclosed his mortgage, before the period for redemption had expired, the first mortgage would have been discharged by such tender. L.R.A. 1918C.

The right of a second mortgagee of chattels to make a tender was not raised in Bank of Benson v. Hove (1890) 45 Minn. 40, 47 N. W. 449, the sufficiency of the tender being denied on other grounds.

But a tender by a second mortgagee of chattels, accompanied by and conditioned upon a demand which he was not legally entitled to make, that certain securities held by the first mortgagee be assigned to him, is an ineffectual tender. Schmittiel v. Moore (1894) 101 Mich. 590, 60 N. W. 279, affirmed on second appeal in (1899) 120 Mich. 199, 79 N. W. 195. This raises a question not within the scope of the note. See sufficiency of tender made on condition, II. d, 2, of the note to Parker v. Beasley, 33 L.R.A. 231, and also I. e, 2, relating to real estate mortgages.

In holding that a junior mortgagee of chattels who had tendered the amount due on a prior mortgage to the sheriff, who held the property for the purpose of foreclosing the senior mortgage, was entitled to recover possession of the chattels, the court in DeLuce v. Root (1899) 12 S. D. 141, 80 N. W. 181, says that the rights of the junior mortgagee were the same as the mortgagor's. "She was required to pay, or offer to pay, the same amount that the mortgagor would have been required to pay to satisfy the claim of the senior mortgagee." And the court concludes that as the junior mortgagee offered to pay a sum in excess of the amount due on the senior mortgage, she was entitled to be subrogated to all the benefits of the superior lien.

<sup>21</sup> Graffin v. State (1906) 103 Md. 171, 68 Atl. 373, 7 Ann. Cas. 1061, holding a surety on the committee of a lunatic, who had taken a second mortgage on premises, not entitled to make a tender of the amount due on the first mortgage to the mortgagee therein. The court states that the surety did not owe the mortgage debt on the property, that he did not own the property, and had no interest of any kind in it, but was a total stranger, and could not, therefore, as a volunteer, make a valid tender of the money due on the first mortgage.

that "to make an effectual tender, it must appear that at the time when it was made the party making it had the right to tender payment of the debt, as in the case of the debtor himself or his representatives, or the holder of the title to the estate on which the debt was a lien; or that he had the right to require a transfer of it, as in the case of subrogation of a surety, or redemption sought by the holder of some subsequent lien having that equity. The demand should clearly disclose the right of the party making the offer, so that the creditor may be notified of his duty to accept."<sup>23</sup>

A distinction must be observed between a tender for the purpose of discharging the lien of a mortgage and one for the purpose of acquiring rights therein.<sup>24</sup>

(1897) 55 N. J. Eq. 674, 38 Atl. 289, holding that a purchaser at a foreclosure sale held under a junior mortgage, whose relation to the property was not disclosed, is not entitled to make the tender. The tender was also held insufficient in this case on the ground that it was coupled with a demand that the bond secured by the prior mortgage be assigned.

<sup>24</sup> Procter v. Robinson (1877) 35 Mich. 284, holding that a second mortgagee who intends to make an offer of money by way of tender in payment, and with the purpose of insisting that the lien of the earlier mortgage be discharged in case of refusal to accept it, is bound to act in a straightforward way and distinctly and fairly make known his true purpose.

Practically the same idea is expressed in Frost v. Yonkers Sav. Bank (1877) 70 N. Y. 553, 26 Am. Rep. 627.

A tender by an attorney for a chattel mortgagor was treated as good in Daugherty v. Byles (1879) 41 Mich. 61, 1 N. W. 919, where the parties thereafter acted upon the assumption that an effectual tender had been made.

It is held in Porter v. Farmers & M. Sav. Bank (1909) 143 Iowa, 629, 120 N. W. 633, that a mortgagee to whom property has been conveyed by the mortgagor under an agreement that the mortgagor should have a stated time in which to redeem it cannot object to an offer to redeem made by the wife of the mortgagor, where it appeared that the mortgagor himself was away from home during most or all of the time covered by the transaction, and that the wife was in personal charge of the property, and to a great extent conducted the negotiations with the mortgagee, and the husband ratified and affirmed her action therein. L.R.A.1918C.

It is usually held that an agent of the mortgagor may make the tender.<sup>25</sup> In the cases thus holding the mortgagee apparently knew the party represented by the agent. In some cases it is expressly made a condition of the tender by another that the mortgagee understand for whom it is made.<sup>26</sup> It has been held that where the mortgagee does not understand this, the agent is in the position of a stranger and the tender is not good.<sup>27</sup>

An assignee for the benefit of creditors may make the tender if the mortgagee understands his relation to the mortgaged property and recognizes his right to make it, or waives objection to a tender by the assignee by failing to make objection at the time of the tender.<sup>28</sup>

See Rice v. Kahn (1887) 70 Wis. 323, 35 N. W. 465, supra.

<sup>26</sup> It was urged in one case by the mortgagees of a chattel that they could not be compelled to accept a tender from an agent unless they had an opportunity of knowing his authority. In answer to this contention, the court states that upon the facts there was some conflict in testimony, "but the charge of the court was very strong in requiring that they should have a reasonable opportunity to see the paper, and learn the extent of the authority;" and since there was evidence which tended to show that the mortgagees had this opportunity, it must be assumed that it was satisfactory to the jury. Eslow v. Mitchell (1873) 26 Mich. 500.

In an action of replevin by a mortgagor of chattels to recover the same, which had been taken by the mortgagee, the plaintiff relied upon a tender of the amount of the mortgage debt by a subsequent mortgagee. It is assumed that to entitle the plaintiff to rely upon this tender it must have been made on his behalf. Whether it was made on his behalf was left to the jury under instructions that if the subsequent mortgagee was acting on behalf of the plaintiff and made the tender for him, and what was said and done and the information imparted were sufficient to appraise the mortgagee that the tender was being made for the mortgagor, it was sufficient. This instruction was held sufficiently favorable to the mortgagee in the replevin action. Shattuck v. Cole (1892) 91 Mich. 580, 52 N. W. 69.

In Juckett v. Fargo Mercantile Co. (1905) 19 S. D. 150, 102 N. W. 604, a receiver of the mortgagor was held not entitled to make a tender that would discharge a mortgage according to an agreement entered into subsequently to the mortgage, between the mortgagor and mortgagee, by the terms of which the mortgage was to be discharged upon certain terms therein stated. The mortgagor was in default at the time of the tender by the receiver, and the court relies upon this fact also in denying the receiver's right to make the tender.

LINCOLN MEMORIAL UNIVERSITY
et al.

(— Tenn. —, 197 S. W. 862.)

Limitation of actions — married women — statutory removal of disability — effect.

A statute fully emancipating women from all disability on account of coverture, giving them the same right to sue and be sued as if unmarried, repeals the provision in the Statute of Limitations entitling married women to bring actions within a specified time after removal of their disability, so that an action for personal injury must be brought by a married woman within the time specified by statute after the injury occurs.

CERTIORARI to the Court of Civil Appeals to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Knox County overruling a motion for new trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligent treatment of plaintiff while in the defendant hospital. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. Bailey Wray and John W. Green, for plaintiff in certiorari:

Plaintiff, a married woman, is not barred by the Statute of Limitations from bringing this suit, and the Act of 1913, chapter 26, removing the disability of coverture to a certain extent, has no bearing upon actions for personal injuries.

Messrs. Brown & Burrows also for defendants in certiorari.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

When the Married Woman's Emancipation Act (1913, chap. 26) went into effect, was the exemption of married women from the operation of the general Statute of Limitations abrogated?

The action in favor of plaintiff, a married woman, was for personal injuries to herself, and was commenced after the lapse of the period of one year from the accrual of the cause of action allowed by the Statute of Limitations for the bringing of suit.

It is claimed by the plaintiff that the suit is saved from the bar of that statute by reason of the exemption clause in favor of married women.

Thompson's Shannon's Code, § 4448, is as follows: "If the person entitled to commence the action is, at the time the cause of action accrued, . . . a married woman, such person . . . may commence the action, after the removal of such disability, within the time of limitation for the particular cause of action, unless it exceed three years, and in that case within three years from the removal of such disability."

The defendant contends that this saving clause is not applicable since the Married Woman's Act went into effect, January 1, 1914, and the injuries were sustained subsequent to that date.

That act was one "to remove disabilities of coverture from married women," and provides that married women are fully emancipated from all disability on account of coverture, and that every woman now married shall have the same capacity to sue and be sued, with all the rights and incidents thereof, as if she were not married. Act 1913, chap. 26, Thompson's Shannon's Code, § 4249a.

It was held in Lillienkamp v. Rippetoe, 133 Tenn. 57, L.R.A.1916B, 881, 179 S. W. 628, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 901, that the last-named act did not abrogate the common-law rule that one spouse cannot sue the other for assault; and the same ruling has been made quite general in other jurisdictions in respect of all civil actions sought to be brought by the wives against their husbands, notwithstanding emancipation acts which do not expressly confer that right. These decisions, however, are based upon the principle of public policy involved in the common-law rule denying the right of action.

We are to deal here with a claim of exemption based upon a statute, not upon the common law or upon any considerations of public policy.

In Knoxville R. & Light Co. v. Vangilder, 132 Tenn. 487, 499, L.R.A.1916A, 1111, 178 S. W. 1117, 10 N. C. C. A. 820, it was held that a married woman's right of action for her personal injuries was within the purview of the provision respecting her suing as if she were a feme covert.

The courts are in hopeless conflict on the far-reaching question that stands for solution, and the reasoning in favor of each of two views and rulings is as cogent as the conclusions reached are divergent.

The arguments advanced in the cases that hold that the exemption of married women from the general Statute of Limitations remains effective in such circumstances may be thus summarized:

(a) The wife is always largely under the influence and control of her husband, and the naked legal right to sue may be of little avail to her if his influence or command be that suit shall not be brought.

(b) A married woman is not exempted from the operation of the general statute merely because she is not allowed to sue alone, but on account of the marital relation itself, which may be supposed to disable or embarrass her in the assertion of her rights.

(c) Mere ability to sue does not create an obligation to do so.

(d) There is no logical impropriety in the legislature providing that a married woman may sue alone, and in providing also that she may be given time to sue after the disability of coverture is removed; therefore a repeal of the earlier statute by implication is not effected by reason of repugnancy in the two acts.

Adhering to this view are the courts of Kentucky, Missouri, New Jersey, Ohio, Oregon, and Wyoming, and Mr. Wood in 2 Wood, Limitations, 2d ed. § 240.

The reasoning in cases holding to the contrary is as follows:

(a) It is the disability as the result of marriage, and not the marriage itself, that is the reason for the exception or saving clause in the general statute. It is the disability that is removed; the marriage status is not in contemplation for removal as an impediment.

(b) The reason for the exception ceasing, the saving clause ceases also, and is no longer protective of the married woman.

Announcing this doctrine are the decisions in a majority of the jurisdictions that have pronounced,—England, Arkansas, California, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Maine, Michigan, Nebraska, New York, Pennsylvania; and more recently, and since the passage of acts of complete emancipation, as we understand their decisions, the courts of North Carolina (Bond v. Beverly, 152 N. C. 63, 67 S. E. 55, and Graves v. Howard, 159 N. C. 594, 75 S. E. 998, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 565) and Mississippi (Wyatt v. Wyatt, 81 Miss. 219, 32 So. 317).

We are of opinion that the direction to be given our ruling on the point was indicated by the opinion of this court in the recent case of Gould v. Frost, 138 Tenn. —, 196 S. W. 949. It was there held that a section (3532, Thompson's Shannon's Code) of the Mechanics' Lien Statute which contained a provision which tended to the protection of married women as a class was abrogated by the Married Women's Act, generally known as the Emancipation Act, since the effect of the later act was completely to emancipate so far as disability inhering in marriage was concerned.

The section of the Mechanics' Lien Act provided that the lien should have application to lands of femes covert when the contract is evidenced by a writing signed by her. In the case referred to there was no written agreement. It was said that the legislature intended by this provision in favor of married women to obviate "the disability of coverture" and to prescribe the manner in which it could be done; that such disability was the reason for the exceptional and favorable treatment accorded when it was required that there be a signed written instrument in order to the binding of the realty of femes covert. It therefore followed that when the later act removed that disability the reason for the shielding clause in the earlier act ceased, and the lien of the mechanic was enforced.

The argument was that employed in the cases that announce the majority rule on the question under consideration in the pending case. It results that the removal of the disability of coverture and the grant to plaintiff of the right to sue and be sued, "with all the incidents thereof, as if she were not married," removed the exemption which otherwise would have excluded her from the operation of the Statute of Limitations. Plaintiff's cause of action arose after the Emancipation Act went into effect, and was barred, therefore, when she brought suit.

The Court of Civil Appeals and the trial judge reached the same conclusion, and an affirmance results.

Annotation—Statutory removal of disability of coverture as repealing exception in Statute of Limitations in favor of married women.

It is the aim of the note to discuss the question whether the so-called Married Women's Acts, conferring on married women certain rights of property and of action, have repealed by implication the exception commonly found in Statutes of Limitations in their favor. The note does not purport to cover cases involving express statutory repeal of the exception,<sup>1</sup> although some cases of this kind are incidentally referred to.

The statutory provisions either as regards the exception or the capacity to sue are not uniform, and as far as possible have been set out. But frequently the court refers to the statute without quoting it, or otherwise fully indicating its scope.

On the question presented the authorities are in conflict, due in part to differences in statutes, but chiefly, it appears, to differences as to the interpretation and purpose of the exception in the Statutes of Limitations in favor of married women. It has been said that the trend of recent decisions is against the doctrine of implied repeal by the Married Women's Acts of the saving clause in favor of married women in the Statutes of Limitation.<sup>2</sup> But from the cases in the note it does not appear that there is a clear trend of authority either way on this question.

It is to be observed that the doctrine attributed to any particular jurisdiction merely represents the judicial precedents in that jurisdiction, and not necessarily the present state of the law on the point, since the situation may have been entirely changed by subsequent statutes.

Among the states in which it has been held that exceptions have been repealed by implication by the enactment of statutes conferring on married women rights of property and of action are Georgia,<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> For example, it appears that in 1895 the legislature amended the Texas statute limiting the time for beginning an action for recovery of real property by omitting married women from the excepted classes entitled to additional time after the removal of disability within which to bring the action, the amendment providing, however, that limitations should not begin to run against married women until they were twenty-one years of age, and that their disability should continue one year after the passage of the act. Among other cases construing this statute, see Williams v. Bradley (1902) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 67 S. W. 170; Beale v. Johnson (1907) 45 Tex. Civ. App. 119, 99 S. W. 1045; *Shook v. <sup>3</sup> Ga.—The cases of Sparks v. Roberts (1880) 65 Ga. 571, and Perkins v. Crompton (1882) 69 Ga. 736, hold that, since the passage of the Married Woman's Act of 1866 and subsequent statutes removing the disability of married women to sue, the Statute of Limitations runs against them the same as against other persons. But the statutory provisions involved are not set out.

<sup>4</sup> Ill.—The Illinois statute of 1861 provides: "All property, both real and personal, belonging to any married woman as her sole and separate property, or which any woman hereafter married owns at the time of her marriage, or which any married woman, during coverture, acquires in good faith from any person other than her husband, by descent, devise, or otherwise, together with all the rents, issues, increase, and profits thereof, shall, notwithstanding her marriage, be and remain, during coverture, her sole and separate property, under her sole control, and be held and possessed and enjoyed by her the same as though she was sole and unmarried, and shall not be subject to the disposal, control, or interference of her husband, and shall be exempt from execution or attachment for the debts of her husband." And it was held in Castner v. Walrod (1876) 83 Ill. 171, 25 Am. Rep. 369, that this statute repealed by implication the saving clause in the Statute of Limitations entitling married women to bring actions within the time limited after becoming femes sole. The court expressly overruled on this point Morrison v. Norman (1868) 47 Ill. 477, and Noble v. McFarland (1869) 51 Ill. 226.

To the same effect as Castner v. Walrod, supra, are Hayward v. Gunn (1876) 82 Ill. 385; Enos v. Buckley (1880) 94 Ill. 459; Geisen v. Heiderich (1882) 104 Ill. 537; Safford v. Stubbs (1886) 117 Ill. 389, 7 N. E. 653; Miller v. Pence (1890) 132 Ill. 149, 23 N. E. 1030; Beattie v. Whipple (1894) 154 Ill. 273, 40 N. E. 340; Kibbe v. Ditto (1877) 93 U. S. 674, 23 L. ed. 1005 (construing Illinois statutes).

In Hayward v. Gunn (1876) 82 Ill. 385, the court said that the necessary effect of the Act of 1861 investing married women with the sole control of their separate property was, as to such property, to place them in precisely the same position, as far as the Statute of Limitations was concerned, that they would occupy if femes sole; that the exception in favor of married women in the Statutes of Limitation was because of their disability to sue without consent of their husbands and the joining of their names, and that, this disability being removed by the Act of 1861, a married woman should be held to the same promptness in the assertion of her right as any other property owner.

In Enos v. Buckley (1880) 94 Ill. 459, the court said that since the enactment of the Married Woman's Act of 1861 the saving clause in favor of married women in the limitation law had no force, but applied against a married woman equally as against an unmarried woman, without regard to whether the property of a married woman be strictly in legal understanding, before the passage of the act, her separate property or not, and without regard to the time of its acquisition, whether since or before the enactment of the statute, or whether during or before coverture.

The Illinois Statutes of 1861 and 1874, enlarging the rights and legal capacities of married women, by implication repealed all savings in their favor in existing limitation laws, including that relating to the prosecution of writs of error. Geisen v. Heiderich (1882) 104 Ill. 537.

Cousens* (1863) 51 Me. 301 (statute enabling a married woman to sue in her own name as if unmarried, and to make any bond or contract or perform any matter or thing necessary to the prosecution of such suits, held to repeal the provision in the Statute of Limitation entitling married women to bring actions within the time limited after the disability was removed).

<sup>6</sup> Mich.—King v. Merritt (1887) 67 Mich. 194, 34 N. <sup>7</sup> Neb.—Murphy v. J. H. Evans City Steam Laundry Co. (1897) 52 Neb. 593, 72 N. W. 960 (the Statute of 1871, providing that a woman may, while married, sue and be sued in the same manner as if she were unmarried, being held to repeal the provision in a Statute of Limitations entitling married women to bring actions within the time limited after the disability was removed). To the same effect is Linton v. Heye (1903) 69 Neb. 450, 111 Am. St. Rep. 556, 95 N. W. 1040, holding that the rule applied to nonresident married women.

In Pope v. Hooper (1877) 6 Neb. 178, it was held that as the common-law disability of a married woman had been removed by the Act of 1871, entitling a married woman to sue and be sued in the same manner as if unmarried, she no longer came within the protection of a statute authorizing the vacation or modification of judgments at a subsequent term in erroneous proceedings against certain classes, including married women.

And in Smithson v. Smithson (1893) 37 Neb. 535, 40 Am. St. Rep. 504, 56 N. W. 300, the court stated that the exception in favor of married women, in a statute providing that proceedings to vacate or modify a judgment on the ground of fraud must be begun within two years after the rendition thereof unless the party entitled thereto is a married woman, could have no force, in view of subsequent statutes removing the disability imposed by the common law on married women.

that she could not convey or mortgage her real estate unless her husband joined, and could not become accommodation indorser, guarantor, or surety, repealed the provision in a Statute of Limitation that if any person was a feme covert at the time the cause of action accrued she might maintain the action within the time limited after discovery.

To the same effect is Nissley v. Brubaker (1899) 192 Pa. 388, 43 Atl. 967. And see Orr v. Orr (1911) 22 Pa. Dist. R. 887, in which it is implied, apparently, that a married woman is not excepted from the operation of the Statute of Limitations.

<sup>9</sup> Tenn.—McIRVIN v. LINCOLN MEMORIAL UNIVERSITY, ante, 191; Chapin v. Nashville (1910) 1 Tenn. C. C. A. 317, holding that a statute providing that where a husband has deserted his family the wife may prosecute or defend, in his name, any action which he might have prosecuted or defended, and may also sue and be sued in her own name for any cause of action accruing subsequent to the desertion, operated, as to cases within its scope, to repeal the provision in the Statute of Limitations entitling married women to bring actions within a specified time after removal of their disability.

<sup>10</sup> N. Y.—In Ball v. Bullard (1868) 52 Barb. 141, it was held that the New York Statutes of 1860 and 1862, entitling married women to bring actions as though they were femes sole, repealed by implication the saving clause in a Statute of Limitations excepting married women therefrom, and providing that the time of such disability should not be a part of the time limited for the commencement of the action. The court said: "It was the disability by reason of marriage, and not marriage itself, that was the reason for the exception; and it was the disability, not the marriage, that was removed. As the law previously stood marriage created this impediment and the wife could not bring the action alone. She had no security that the damages would become hers when recovered. The statutes referred to wisely changed all this. In their effect, marriage was no longer a disability to the wife. The reason of the law ceasing, the law itself ceases also." This case was, however, disapproved in Clark v. McCann (1879) 18 Hun, 13, which was reversed on other grounds in (1880) 83 N. Y. 107.

<sup>10a</sup> It was held in Clark v. McCann, supra, that, although the Statute of 1860 had removed the disabilities of a married woman to bring an action to recover land, the provision in the twenty-year Statute of Limitation of 1849 excepting married women from the operation of the statute, and permitting them to bring the action within ten years after the disability ceased, was not thereby cases<sup>13</sup> also support the doctrine of repeal by implication.

The right to sue as if unmarried conferred on married women by statute not being limited to married women who are residents of the state, the rule that the repealed; and that the saving clause in favor of married women in the Statute of Limitations continued until the legislature in 1870 struck out the words "married women" from among the excepted classes.

And in Acker v. Acker (1880) 81 N. Y. 143, the court intimated that the fact of marriage created the disability within the meaning of the saving clause of the statute as it existed prior to 1870, stating that "by law certain persons are deemed disabled to bring such suit; and among them, once on a time, was a married woman. . . . The fact that she was a woman, and married, created the disability. Such, we think, is the plain meaning of the old Code." It is not that if she is under disability and is also a married woman; it is the fact of marriage, as it is the fact of insanity or of infancy, that is the disability. We say this, as a part of the appellant's argument was that there must exist a disability and also the state of marriage."

<sup>11</sup> The Statute of 1870 by striking out the words "married women" from among the excepted classes in the limitation statutes was held in Acker v. Acker, supra, and Clarke v. Gibbons (1880) 83 N. Y. 107, to leave the Statutes of Limitation operative as to married women the same as to other persons.

<sup>12</sup> Eng.—The view that after the passage of the Married Women's Property Act of 1882, giving married women the right to sue in all respects as femes sole, married women were discovert within the meaning of the English Statute of Limitations, entitling married women to bring actions within the time limited after becoming discovert, is supported by the cases of Lowe v. Fox (1885) L. R. 15 Q. B. Div. 667, 53 L. T. N. S. 886, 54 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 561, 34 Week. Rep. 144, 50 J. P. 244, and Weldon v. Neal (1884) 32 Week. Rep. 828. In the latter case it was said: "There is, however, an exception in that statute in favor of certain persons, and among others of married women, by which married women are at liberty to bring their actions within such times as are by the statute limited after being discovert. That is to say, a married woman has her rights reserved until she is in a position to sue in her own name. The Married Women's Property Act, 1882, gave to every married woman the right of suing, either in contract or in tort, in all respects as if she were a feme sole. The plaintiff therefore obtained her full rights on the 1st of January, 1883, and has brought her action within the statutable time from that date."

<sup>13</sup> Can.—In Re Laws (1881) 28 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 382, although the decision that there could be no recovery by a wife after her husband's death for money which she claimed to have loaned to him is based by two of the judges on other grounds. Proudfoot, V. C., concurred on the ground that the claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations, since, under the Married Woman's Act of 1859, she might have maintained an action against him therefor. And the opinion of another of the judges contains intimations to the same effect.

The Statute of Limitations was considered in Cameron v. Walker (1890) 19 Ont. Rep. 212, as running against a married woman after the enactment of the Statute of 1876, which it was said removed the disability of coverture. The statutes, however, are not set out.

<sup>15</sup> Ky.—The fact that the property in question was the general property of the wife, and that by statute she was entitled in such cases to sue alone if her husband refused to join her in the action, was held in Onions v. Covington & C. Elev. R. & Transfer & Bridge Co. (1899) 107 Ky. 154, 53 S. W. 8, not to remove the plaintiff, during coverture, from the protection of a provision in a Statute of Limitations entitling married women to bring actions within a specified time after the removal of the disability.

The Kentucky Statute of 1894 provides: "A married woman may take, acquire, and hold property, real and personal, by gift, devise, or descent, or by purchase, and she may, in her own name, as if she were unmarried, sell and dispose of her personal property. She may make contracts and sue and be sued, as a single woman, except that she may not make any executory contract to sell or convey or mortgage her real estate unless her husband join in such contract, but she shall have the power and right to rent out her real estate, and collect, receive, and recover in her own name the rents thereof, and make contracts for the improvement thereof." And this statute has been held not to repeal by implication the saving clause in Statutes of Limitations entitling married women to bring actions within a specified time after removal of the disability. Terrell v. Maupin (1904) 26 Ky. L. Rep. 1203, 83 S. W. 591; Sturgill v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (1903) 116 Ky. 659, 76 S. W. 826; Higgins v. Stokes (1903) 116 Ky. 664, 76 S. W. 834, 3 Ann. based in part upon the fact that the Married Woman's Act did not remove all the disabilities of coverture. But other grounds also are stated for the conclusions reached. See, for example, quotation from Terrell v. Maupin, cited in note 49, infra.

A statute authorizing a wife who is abandoned by her husband to make contracts, sue, and be sued as a single woman, after being empowered to do so by judgment of a court of equity, was held in McDanell v. Landrum (1888) 87 Ky. 404, 12 Am. St. Rep. 500, 9 S. W. 223, not to operate, on the abandonment of the wife, to remove her disability, within the meaning of a provision in the Statute of Limitations entitling a married woman to bring action within a specified time after the removal of the disability; the disability being removed so as to set in motion the Statute of Limitation, only when the judgment is rendered authorizing her to sue.

<sup>16</sup> Mo.—Lindell Real Estate Co. v. Lindell (1897) 142 Mo. 61, 43 S. W. 368, holding that a statute entitling married women to sue and be sued without joining their husbands with the same effect as if femes sole did not repeal by implication the exception in favor of married women in the general Statute of Limitation.

That a married woman after abandonment by her husband had the legal capacity to maintain the action in her own name, was held in Throckmorton v. Pence (1894) 121 Mo. 50, 25 S. W. 843, not to preclude her from the benefit of the saving clause in the Statute of Limitation, providing that if any person entitled to begin an action be, at the time the cause of action accrues, a married woman, the time during which such disability continues shall not be deemed a part of the time limited for the commencement of the action.

See also Dubowsky v. Binggeli (1914) 184 Mo. App. 361, 171 S. W. 12, in which the court cites Throckmorton v. Pence and Lindell Real Estate Co. v. Lindell, supra, in stating that the plaintiff was a married woman when the note in question was given, so that the Statute of Limitations would not run against her. But the question is not otherwise discussed.

It was held in Babcock v. Adams (1917) — Mo. —, 196 S. W. 1118, and Graham v. Ketchum (1905) 192 Mo. 15, 90 S. W. 350, among possibly other cases of the kind, that where a married woman prior to the Married Woman's Act of 1889 because the owner of the legal title to real estate, the right to the possession thereof and to a possessory action therefor immediately vested in the husband; that such right of possession in the husband was a vested right, which could not be taken away by the Married Woman's Act; so that under such conditions the Statute of Limitations did not, during coverture, begin to run against a married woman as regards recovery of such real estate.

In holding that coverture was not an excuse for a failure of the plaintiff to elect within a reasonable time to disaffirm a trustee's sale, the court in Mueller v. Becker (1914) 263 Mo. 165, 172 S. W. 322, said that the plaintiff, notwithstanding her coverture, was sui juris with respect to this transaction; and that, although the unlimited right to transact business on her own account, to contract and be contracted with, to sue and be sued, with which she was clothed by the Act of 1889, did not repeal her statutory exemption from the operation of the Statutes of Limitations, it carried with it all the incidents necessary to make those rights available; that with reference to both rights and duties she was placed on an equality with those with whom she dealt; and that one of the duties growing out of the trust relation she created was the duty to elect within a reasonable time to disaffirm the action of her trustee.

<sup>17</sup> N. J.—Carey v. Paterson (1885) 47 N. J. L. 365, 1 Atl. 473, holding that the exception, in a statute limiting the time for bringing an action to three months after the loss or injury, that if the party bringing the suit be under coverture the limitations should not apply, was not repealed by implication, by a statute permitting a married woman to sue in her own name without joining her husband.

<sup>18</sup> N. C.—State ex rel. Lippard v. Troutman (1875) 72 N. C. 551, holding that a statute entitling a married woman to sue alone with respect to her separate property did not repeal the saving clause in her favor in the Statute of Limitations. To the same effect are State ex rel. Briggs v. Smith (1880) 83 N. C. 306; Campbell v. Crater (1886) 95 N. C. 156; and Wilkes v. Allen (1902) 131 N. C. 279, 42 S. E. 616.

The fact that a married woman had registered as a free trader, as authorized by Statute, was held in Wilkes v. Allen, supra, not to remove her from the exemption excluding married women from the operation of the Statute of Limitations. The court stated that it would be presumed that the statute authorizing the registering of women as free traders was passed for the benefit of married women who wished to engage in business, in order to obtain credit, as was the right to sue alone, and neither right was intended for the benefit of their creditors.

The Statute of 1899, however, repealed coverture as a bar on the running of the Statute of Limitations. It named three classes against which limitations did not run, viz., persons under twenty-one years of age, insane, or imprisoned, and provided that in any action in which the defense of adverse possession was relied upon the time computed as constituting such adverse possession should not be included as against a feme covert during coverture prior to L.R.A.1918C.

February 13, 1899. As construing the statute to the above effect, see, for example, State ex rel. Lafferty v. Young (1899) 125 N. C. 296, 34 S. E. 444; Norcum v. Savage (1906) 140 N. C. 472, 53 S. E. 289; Cherry v. Cape Fear Power Co. (1906) 142 N. C. 404, 55 S. E. 287; Re Beauchamp (1907) 146 N. C. 254, 59 S. E. 687; Bond v. Beverly (1910) 152 N. C. 56, 67 S. <sup>19</sup> Ohio—Ashley v. Rockwell (1885) 43 Ohio St. 386, 2 N. E. 437, holding that statutes making the property of a married woman her separate estate, and authorizing her to sue or be sued alone with respect thereto, did not by implication repeal the saving clause in a Statute of Limitations entitling married women to bring actions within the time limited after the disability was removed. To the same effect is Hurlbut v. Wade (1884) 40 Ohio St. 603, an action by the wife against her husband's executors for money loaned by her to him,—it being held error to sustain a plea of the Statute of Limitations on the ground that the Married Woman's Act had repealed the exception in the Statute of Limitations in favor of married women.

In view of the above Ohio decisions, Ong v. Sumner (1871) 1 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 424, holding that the saving clause in the Statute of Limitations in favor of married women was repealed by implication by the Married Women's Act, seems now not an authority on the question.

In 1883, the saving clause in the Ohio Statute of Limitations in favor of married women was amended so as to provide that the disability of married women should not extend to rights of action of a married woman concerning her separate property, or growing out of or concerning business transacted in her own name. Ham v. Kunzi (1897) 56 Ohio St. 531, 47 N. E. 536 (holding that the amendment did not affect rights of action which had already accrued); see also Yocum v. Allen (1898) 58 Ohio St. 280, 50 N. E. 909, which approves and follows Ham v. Kunzi, supra.

<sup>20</sup> Or.—Morrison v. Holladay (1895) 27 Or. 175, 39 Pac. 1100, the court stating that the exemption of a married woman from the operation of the ten-year Statute of Limitation, and allowing her five years additional time, was founded upon her marital relation, and not upon the idea that such relation prevented her from suing in her own name; and that if the Married Woman's Act removed all the legal disabilities of a married woman, as claimed by the defendant, they did not change her status or remove her marital disability, and so did not repeal or modify the Statute of Limitation; that the additional time was allowed because of her coverture, and not because she was disabled in fact from prosecuting the action; Stubblefield v. Menzies (1882) 8 Sawy. 41, 11 Fed. 268 (construing the Oregon statute).

The same view was taken in a Canadian case<sup>23</sup> in construing the English Statute of Limitations.

In earlier Mississippi cases the same conclusion was reached,<sup>24</sup> although it seems that a different rule prevails under later statutes.<sup>25-27</sup>

In Indiana the decisions that married women are not within the saving

In Wythe v. Smith (1876) 4 Sawy. 17, Fed. Cas. No. 18,122, although apparently unnecessary to the decision, the court expressed an opinion to the effect that under the Oregon statute the saving clause in the Statute of Limitation in favor of married women applied to actions respecting her separate property, although she might as respects such property have sued alone. It was said that the exemption in the Statute of Limitations proceeded upon the theory that while the wife was under the disability of coverture she was not in fact at liberty to sue without her husband's consent, even if the law would permit it.

<sup>21</sup> Wis.—Wiesner v. Zaun (1875) 39 Wis. 188, holding that statutes conferring on a married woman the absolute control of her separate estate as though she were unmarried, and permitting her to sue alone with respect to such estate, did not, as to actions relating to her separate estate, repeal by implication the provision in the Statute of Limitations entitling married women to bring actions within a specified time after the disability ceased. To the same effect is Westcott v. Miller (1877) 42 Wis. 454.

It appears that by statute in 1872 the provision in the Statute of Limitations in Wisconsin respecting actions for the recovery of real property was amended by omitting the exemption in favor of married women. Wiesner v. Zaun, supra.

<sup>22</sup> Wyo.—Bliler v. Boswell (1899) 9 Wyo. 57, 59 Pac. 798, 61 Pac. 867, holding that a statute permitting a married woman to hold and convey property, sue, and be sued the same as though she was feme sole did not operate to repeal by implication the exception in her favor in a Statute of Limitation permitting married women to bring action within a certain time after removal of the disability.

<sup>23</sup> Can.—In Carroll v. Fitzgerald (1899) 5 Ont. App. Rep. 322, it was held that the provision in the English Statute of Limitations entitling married women to bring actions within a specified time after becoming discoverable was not repealed by implication by a statute entitling a married woman to maintain actions in her own name for her separate property and to avail herself of the same remedies against all persons for its protection as if it belonged to her as an unmarried woman.

See, however, notes 12 and 13, supra.

clause in Statutes of Limitation are based chiefly, it seems, on the fact that they were omitted in the Statutes of 1881 from the definition of persons under disability, rather than on the fact that statutes have enlarged the rights of married women.<sup>28</sup>

did not run against the plaintiff, and it was not authorized to disregard or explain away the statutory provision, however decided might be its conviction that, with the investiture of married women with all the rights of property and remedies possessed by persons sui juris, they should not have been included among those saved from the bar of the Statute of Limitations; and that it was bound by the unmistakable statutory declaration that persons under coverture should not be subject to the operation of the Statute of Limitations.

So, in North v. James (1884) 61 Miss. 761, the court stated that the mere ability to sue does not impose an obligation to do so; and that while the complainant might have sued either with or without her husband, after her marriage, she was not compelled to do so, and her failure to sue did not subject her to a plea of the Statute of Limitations.

<sup>25-27</sup> It appears that since the adoption of the Code of 1880, the Constitution of 1890, and the Code of 1892, effecting the complete emancipation of married women, and authorizing suits between husband and wife, the Statute of Limitations runs against claims by a wife against her husband. Wyatt v. Wyatt (1902) 81 Miss. 219, 32 So. 317. The statutory provisions involved are not, however, set out.

<sup>28</sup> Ind.—In Indiana the phrase, "under legal disability," is defined by statute (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 1285) as including persons under twenty-one years of age, or of unsound mind, or imprisoned, or out of the United States. And in view of the fact that married women are not included in this definition, and the further fact that the disability of married women to sue, to enter into contracts, and to control their own property, has been removed by statute, the court, in Rosa v. Prather (1885) 103 Ind. 191, 2 N. E. 575, held that a married woman was not a person under disability within the meaning of a statute entitling any person under legal disabilities to file a complaint to review a judgment at any time within a year after the disability was removed.

Following Rosa v. Prather, supra, the court in Indianapolis v. Patterson (1887) 112 Ind. 344, 14 N. E. 551, held that since the enactment of the Code of 1881, omitting the term "married women" in the definition of the classes of persons under legal disabilities (the Code of 1852 having included married women in such definition), a married woman was not under disability within the meaning of a provision in the Statute of Limitations entitling any person under le-titled to bring the action be a married woman the time of such disability shall not be a part of the time limited for the commencement of the action, was amended in 1863 so as to read that, if she be a married woman, "and her husband be a necessary party with her in commencing such action," the time of such disability shall not be a part of the time limited for beginning the action.<sup>29</sup> And since this amendment it has been held that the Statute of Limitations applies to bar an action by a married woman with respect to her separate property to which her husband was not a necessary party.<sup>30</sup>

The Illinois Married Woman's Act of 1861, which is set out above,<sup>31</sup> has been held not to operate to set in motion the Statute of Limitation against a married woman as regards an estate by the entirety.<sup>32</sup>

Distinction between statutes permitting actions after "discoverture" and after "removal of disability."

In Arkansas a distinction is made as respects repeal by implication between cases whether the statute provides for the bringing of actions by married women within a specified time after discovery gal disability to bring actions within a specified time after the disability was removed. In other words, the court held that the Statute of 1881 operated to remove the disabilities of a married woman the same as they would have been removed by the death of her husband occurring at that time, and that the action must be begun within the time specified after the Statute of 1881 became effective.

And other cases in this state hold that a married woman is not a person under legal disability within the meaning of an exception in Statutes of Limitations in favor of such persons. Royse v. Turnbaugh (1887) 117 Ind. 539, 20 N. E. 485; Sedwick v. Ritter (1890) 128 Ind. 209, 27 N. E. 610; Irey v. Markey (1892) 132 Ind. 546, 32 N. E. 309; Irey v. Mater (1892) 134 Ind. 238, 33 N. E. 1018.

Under the Code prior to 1881, however, the rule was different. Thus, it was contended in Bauman v. Grubbs (1866) 26 Ind. 419, an action by a married woman to recover real property, that marriage was not a disability under the Code, and that the action was barred by the Statute of Limitations. This contention was overruled, the court stating that the fact that a person may sue is not the test, and citing the statute defining the phrase "under legal disabilities" as including married women.

Thus, it was held<sup>33</sup> in that state that the Statute of 1873, empowering married women to sue alone, in their own names, in respect to their separate property, did not repeal by implication a provision in a Statute of Limitation permitting married women to bring actions within a certain time after discovery. But the court intimated that a different conclusion might have been reached if the language of the statute had been, "after removal of disability." And in accord with this intimation, it was held, in a later case<sup>34</sup> in that state, that the Statute of 1873, which the court said gave a married woman the sole and entire control over her property and authorized her to sue alone or be sued in respect to such property, repealed by implication a provision entitling married women to bring an action within the time limited after removal of disability. This distinction, however, while plausible, is not in accord with the result reached in cases which have construed the English statute,<sup>35</sup> and with decisions in some other states.<sup>36</sup> prior to the amendment of 1913, authorizing the wife in such actions to sue alone, the husband was a necessary party, and that, therefore, the action was not barred by limitations.

Wallner* (1875) 80 Ill. 197, that the saving clause of a Statute of Limitations in favor of married women applied after the enactment of the Married Woman's Act of 1861, for the reason that, as the wife's estate was by the entirety, and had previously vested, the statute did not affect it, and after its enactment she could not have sued for any interest therein during coverture without joining her husband.

Reasons for different rules.

It will be observed that the authorities are almost equally divided on the question whether the Married Women's Acts have repealed by implication the exception in favor of married women in Statutes of Limitation. It is therefore the more important to consider somewhat fully the reasons which have led to the different conclusions.

Attention is called in this connection to McIRVIN v. LINCOLN MEMORIAL UNIVERSITY, ante, 191, which states concisely the main reasons for and against the doctrine of implied repeal; and also to a summary of the reasons for and against the doctrine of repeal by implication, as stated in a Missouri case.<sup>37</sup>

It is, of course, a well-established rule that implied repeal of statutes is not favored by the courts.<sup>38</sup> And the general doctrine, it seems, is supported by many cases, that the presumption is always against the intention to repeal, where express terms are not used; that to justify the presumption of such an intention either the two statutes must be irreconcilable or the intent to effect a repeal must be otherwise clearly expressed; and that between the two acts there must be plain, unavoidable, and irreconcilable repugnancy.<sup>39</sup> This rule of statutory construction, applied to the statutes under consideration, has been the basis of the conclusion of many of the courts against the doctrine of repeal by implication.<sup>40</sup>

In most of the states in which the question under consideration has arisen, the Statutes of Limitation entitle married women to bring actions within a specified time after the removal of the disability. And the question whether this provision is repealed by implication by a subsequent statute conferring on married women control of their own

<sup>37</sup> In holding that a provision in the Missouri Statute of Limitations exempting married women was not repealed by implication by the Statute of 1889, entitling married women to sue and be sued alone the same as femes sole, the court in Lindell Real Estate Co. v. Lindell (1897) 142 Mo. 61, 43 S. W. 368, said: "The question is an important one, involving matters of public policy as well as of private right, and has given rise to widely different views on the part of both courts and text-writers. The authorities which deny that the enabling acts relieving a married woman of the disability of coverture do not operate to repeal by implication, or modify, the exception as to coverture contained in the general Statute of Limitations before referred to, proceed upon the theory: (1) Mere ability to sue does not impose an obligation to do so; (2) where a married woman can sue, either with or without her husband, failure to do so will not subject her to a plea of the Statute of Limitations. The authorities maintaining the opposite view meet this argument in this wise, that when the disability is removed the cause for exemption disappears with it, and the exemption itself ceases to exist. On the whole, the former position would seem to be the more reasonable one. It has the support of Wood on Limitations, and the courts of North Carolina, Mississippi, Texas, Oregon, and Ohio. . . . But courts of great respectability, notably those of Illinois, Arkansas, and Maine, hold a contrary doctrine. . . . The whole tenor of our statutes relating to the Married Woman's Acts shows a tendency on the part of the legislature not to abrogate the exception contained in the general Statute of Limitations. While it is true that by the Married Woman's Acts, as revised in 1889, a married woman in this state has been emancipated, to some extent, from the common-law unity of husband and wife, and L.R.A.1918C.

now stands upon advanced ground, more in accordance with enlightened thought and justice, yet it must be borne in mind that the statutory enactments before alluded to do not undertake to confer upon a married woman all of the rights and powers of a feme sole. For this reason we are persuaded that the conclusion reached by division No. 2 in Throckmorton v. Pence (1884) 121 Mo. 50, 25 S. W. 843, is both sound and just. . . . And it may be added that the trend of recent decisions on the subject seems to be in that direction."

In holding that a statute entitling a married woman to sue alone, in her own name, in respect to her separate property, did not repeal by implication a provision in a Statute of Limitation entitling married women to bring an action within a specified time after discovery, the court in Hershy v. Latham (1883) 42 Ark. 305, said that to declare that it was the intention of the legislature, or the necessary consequence of the Married Woman's Act, to shorten the period for bringing such action, was to assume that the only consideration which operated upon the lawmaking power in making an exception in favor of a married woman was her disability to sue at common law without joining her husband; that, although doubtless this was the principal reason, the court was not certain it was the only reason.

property and the right to sue in respect thereto as if unmarried (as most of the Married Women's Acts apparently do) depends, it seems, principally on the construction of the term "disability" as used in the Statute of Limitations, and the purpose of the exception therein in favor of married women. Some of the courts have given as a ground for their decision in favor of repeal by implication that, as the reason for the exception in the Statute of Limitations in favor of married women ceased on the enactment of the Married Women's Acts, the exception itself would be held to be repealed; in other words, they have applied the maxim, "Cessante ratione legis cessat ipsa lex."<sup>41</sup> But, on the other hand, it has been well said that it is seldom that this maxim can be applied to statute law without some encroachment on the province of the legislature, and any attempt to apply it must be at the risk of misinterpreting the intention of the legislature, unless that has been distinctly expressed.<sup>42</sup> And this reason assumes, of course, the purpose of the legislature in making the exception in the Statutes of Limitations in favor of married women, and the meaning of the term "disability" as there used.

The courts, in decisions holding against repeal by implication, have stated as grounds for this view that mere ability to sue does not impose an obligation to do so,<sup>43</sup> and that the right to sue alone is a privilege which may be used to the advantage of a feme covert, but a failure to exercise this privilege cannot operate to her prejudice;<sup>44</sup> that the right to sue alone was conferred on married women for their benefit, and not for that of their creditors;<sup>45</sup> and that the exception was allowed not merely because she was not allowed to sue alone, but on account of the marital relation itself, which may have been supposed to disable her from asserting her rights.<sup>46</sup> This latter case is strengthened by the fact existing in some jurisdictions that among the excepted classes in the Statute of Limitations the legislature has included, with married women, persons who might, if so disposed, have brought an action notwithstanding the so-called disability, as persons absent from the country; so that, it is reasoned, the saving in their favor was not because they were of necessity disabled from suing.<sup>47</sup>

And the fact that among the excepted classes entitled to bring actions within a specified time after the disability ceased were persons imprisoned on a criminal charge, whose rights of action and of contract were not affected thereby, has been considered as tending to show that the legislature by the term "disability" did not mean simply such disability as resulted from the total or partial suspension of civil rights, but also that disability resulting from duress.<sup>48</sup>

This suggests the fundamental question as to which the courts are disagreed; viz., whether the term "disability" in the exception in Statutes of Limitation in favor of married women means legal common-law disabilities on the part of married women to contract, to maintain actions in their own names, etc. If so, it seems that statutes removing these disabilities should be construed as repealing the exception. In other words, if the limitation statute (as is generally the case) entitles married women to bring actions within a certain time after the "disability" is removed, under the above view of the term "disability" the Married Women's Acts as ordinarily enacted should be construed as removing the disability within the meaning of the saving clause in the Statute of Limitations. But if the term "disability" as used in the limitation statutes has a broader meaning and includes other so-called disabilities arising from the fact of marriage itself apart from the legal disabilities imposed by the common law, then the Married Women's

The provision in the savings clause of the Statute of Limitations in favor of married women grew out of their disability, and with the removal of such disability no reason exists for the continuance of the provision in force, and it may properly be regarded as repealed by implication. *King v. Acts would not have the effect of removing the disability. As stated above, the courts are disagreed on this question, and

<sup>49</sup> It was contended in Wiesner v. Zaun (Wis.) supra, that the word "disability" was used in the statute in its technical, legal sense, meaning only an incapacity to sue or to perform a legal act. It was held, however, that the term had a broader meaning. The court said: "The grounds of the disability of a wife are thus stated by Chancellor Kent: 'The disability of the wife to contract so as to bind herself arises not from want of discretion, but because she has entered into an indissoluble connection, by which she is placed under the power and protection of her husband, and because she has not the administration of property, etc.' . . . The law giving her the control of her separate estate removes only one of the grounds of disability. She is still under the control and protection of her husband. He can lawfully control her domicile and her employment. In these particulars she is now, as she was at the common law, under a degree of duress. Although she may have an action in her own name relating to her separate estate, and may administer the same as if unmarried, yet such quasi duress, which is a recognized element of legal disability, still remains."

In Ashley v. Rockwell (1885) 43 Ohio St. 386, 2 N. E. 437, it was said: "There would seem to be no difficulty or logical impropriety in the legislature providing that a married woman may sue alone, and in also providing that she may have a given time to sue after the disability of coverture is removed. If the sole reason, object, and purpose of the saving clause in the Statute of Limitations was to protect her right of action until she had the legal right to maintain an action without joining her husband or prosecuting by next friend, then the argument of repeal by implication might be unanswerable. But was that the only object the legislature had in view? Can we say this is the only, or even the controlling, reason that influenced the legislature to put married women within the protection of the saving clause? The wife is always largely within the power of the husband. She may have the naked legal right to sue, and that be of little value or avail to her if he commands her to the contrary. She ought to have the right to sue after his influence, power, and command are no longer felt. We at least have not the right to say that this consideration may not have influenced the legislature in enacting and re-enacting this clause after the statute relating to the rights of married women was enacted, and the court is of opinion that no such repugnancy exists between these statutes as to work a repeal by implication."

And in construing the provision in the Kentucky Statute of Limitations, to the effect that if at the time the cause of action accrued the party entitled to bring the action was a married woman the action might be brought within the like number of years after the removal of such disability, the court in Terrell v. Maupin (1904) 26 Ky. L. Rep. 1203, 83 S. W. 591, said: "The exception in favor of married women is unequivocal, and does not at all depend on whether they might or might not have sued notwithstanding the fact that they were married. Their ability to maintain the suit under the Code, or under the Act of 1894, is not a test of whether the statute runs against them. The sole test is whether or not they are married women. The legislature had the power to enact a general statute applicable to all of a class. Having done so, and providing for a suspension of the Statutes of Limitation during a designated condition of that certain class, there is nothing left for the courts to do but to apply the statute as enacted. It is to be noted that the statute does not read that the married woman must be under the disability of marriage from bringing a suit before she will have the benefit of the statute, but it says that if she be a married woman, or if such person be an infant or of unsound mind, the statute is suspended in their behalf. The words, 'disability of such person,' occurring later in the statute, do not mean disability to sue, but are merely descriptive of the condition of the person."

In Morrison v. Holladay (1895) 27 Or. 175, 39 Pac. 1100, the court, in holding that even if the Married Women's Acts removed all the legal disabilities of a married woman, as contended by the defendant, they did not repeal the provision in the Statute of Limitation allowing a married woman five years' additional time within which to maintain an action, stated that this additional time was allowed because of her coverture, and not because she was disabled in fact from prosecuting the action.

<sup>50</sup> In Brown v. Cousens (1863) 51 Me. 301, the court overruled the contention that the moral, social, and marital influence of the husband over the wife should be regarded as a disability within the meaning of the saving clause in favor of married women in the Statute of Limitations, saying that the latter provision was designed to relieve cases of disability, and not of disinclination, or of moral or social impediment; and that a restraining influence of the nuptial relation might as well be pleaded in behalf of the husband as of the wife, under the present statute.

In Hicks's Estate (1898) 7 Pa. Super. Ct. 274, the court stated that the exception in the Statute of Limitations in favor of married women was inserted because they might not sue without the consent and joinder of their husbands; that the disability was removed by the Married Persons' Property Act, and added: "Except where the contrary is expressed, we cannot think it was the purpose, when practically removas used in the saving clause in Statutes of Limitation, should be construed as broad enough to include disability arising from the marriage itself, are indicated in the footnotes.

While the weight or trend of authority cannot be said to be clearly one way or the other on this question, the more plausible view seems to be that the disabilities referred to in Statutes of Limitation entitling married women to bring actions within a specified time after the disabilities are removed are not the moral influence or so-called "quasi duress" exercised by the husband, but the common-law legal disabilities arising from the marriage relation, and that when these are all, or substantially all, removed by statute, the "disability" is removed within the meaning of the exception.

The fact that the legislature, after the enactment of the Married Women's Act, retains the words "married women" in enumerating the excepted classes in the Statute of Limitations in a revision or amendment of the statutes, has been held not to show conclusively a legislative intention not to repeal by implication the exception in their favor.<sup>51</sup> But in other cases this has been regarded as a circumstance tending to show that repeal by implication was not intended.<sup>52</sup>

Claim by wife against husband.

Even though, as to claims against third persons, the Statute of Limitations may run against a married woman, who, under the Married Women's Acts, might have maintained the action in her own name and enjoyed the benefits of recovery free from the control of her husband, yet limitations may not run against her as to a claim against her husband, for the reason that the Married Women's Acts may not permit the maintenance of such an action. Reference is made in the note to cases so holding.<sup>53</sup>

ing all her disabilities, to put or leave her in a better situation than is occupied by members of the same class to which she now belongs. It would be a reproach to the law to have it said that of two neighboring merchants each sui juris, and having equal rights to make and enforce contracts, the remedy of the one should exist for only six years, while the other could bring suit, and recover, perhaps as late as the middle of the next century. Public policy and the duty to escape absurd results forbid any interpretation that would lead to such unjust and unequal consequences, if there is any reasonable way to avoid them."

In Nissley v. Brubaker (1899) 192 Pa. 388, 43 Atl. 967, the court stated that the statute conferring on married women the right to sue and be sued in the same manner as if they were single operated as a repeal of the proviso in the limitation act which prevented the Statute of Limitations from running against married women until they became discoverd, because a right to sue is fundamentally inconsistent with the disability to sue, and by consequence removed the disability.

<sup>51</sup> In Brown v. Cousens (1863) 51 Me. 301, the court reached the conclusion that the statute entitling married women to sue in their own names as if unmarried repealed the provision in the Statute of Limitations entitling married women to sue within the time limited after the disability was removed, notwithstanding the fact that after the enactment of the former statute the saving clause in favor of married women in the Statute of Limitations was reincorporated into the revised statutes. The court regarded such retention as a mere inadvertence.

And the fact that in the amendment of 1863 the reference to married women among the excepted classes in the saving clause of L.R.A.1918C.

the Statute of Limitations was retained was held in Curbay v. Bellemer (1888) 70 Mich. 106, 87 N. W. 911, not to show necessarily an intention by the legislature to retain this clause in force as to married women notwithstanding they had been relieved from all disability to sue by a statute enacted in 1855. The amendment made a change in another respect in the saving clause, and the court stated that the legislature had no intention of changing the legal effect of the statute in any other respect; that this was prior to its decision declaring the repeal of the clause in favor of married women (see King v. Merritt (1887) 67 Mich. 194, 34 N. W. 689), and that there was no reason or necessity for the consideration of the subject by the legislature at that time; so that the retention and legal effect of the continuance of the repealed clause could only be regarded as if the amendment had not been made.

For example the Maine statute authorizing a married woman to sue in her own name as if unmarried was held in Morrison v. Brown (1891) 84 Me. 82, 24 Atl. 672, to refer to actions by the wife against third persons, and not to actions by her against

It should be observed, however, that these decisions turn on a question not within the scope of the note, viz., whether the wife might have maintained an action against the husband during coverture, and that the note does not purport to cover this class of cases.<sup>54</sup>

Where the wife during coverture might under statute have maintained an action against the husband the doctrine of implied repeal by the Married Women's Acts has been applied in actions on claims by the wife against the husband.<sup>55</sup> And in some cases the court has merely applied to a claim by a wife against her husband's estate the general doctrine that a statute enlarging the rights of married women does not repeal by implication the exception in favor of married women in Statutes of Limitation.<sup>56</sup>

Attention is called to the fact that the note excludes cases in which it does not appear that there was an exception in favor of married women in the Statute of Limitations, although the question arose whether under the statutes enlarging the rights of married women limitations ran on a claim by a wife against her husband.<sup>57</sup>

her husband, so that as to the latter class of action she is still under disability, within the meaning of the saving clause in the Statute of Limitations. As illustrative of cases not within the scope of the note, to the effect that during the relation of coverture the wife cannot maintain an action against the husband notwithstanding the statute permitting her to prosecute and defend actions as if unmarried, see Smith v. Gorman (1856) 41 Me. 405; Crowther v. Crowther (1868) 55 Me. 358; Small v. Small (1889) 129 Pa. 366, 18 Atl. 497.

In Barnett v. Harshbarger (Ind.) supra, the court said: "The unity which a settled rule of law has recognized through so many years cannot be disregarded, and it prevents the operation of the general statute removing the disabilities of married women. The question cannot be disposed of by assuming that the disability of the wife alone prevents her from dealing with her husband, for, as we have seen, the husband who was free from disability, and at liberty to deal with all others except his wife, could not at law deal with her. The question is not whether disabilities have been removed, but whether the long prevailing rule of the law, declaring husband and wife to be one person, in legal contemplation, has been annulled. This question cannot be solved by affirming that a disability has been removed, for there yet remains the positive rule that the husband and wife are one person."

Attention is called also to Graves v. Howard (1912) 159 N. C. 594, 75 S. E. 998, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 565, where, under a statute entitling the wife to maintain an action against her husband, and the act repealing coverture as a bar upon the running of the Statute of Limitations, the statute was held to run against a claim by a wife against her husband.

<sup>57</sup> See, for instance, Rice v. Crozier (1908) 139 Iowa, 629, 130 Am. St. Rep. 340, 117 N. W. 984, holding that an action by a wife against the administrator of her husband on a note signed by him was barred by the Statute of Limitations, since the disability of a married woman to sue her husband in relation to her separate estate had been removed by statute. Messrs. E. L. Burton, George F. Burton, and F. O. Martin for appellee.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

P. T. Foley was arrested upon a charge of paying persons to work (and in some instances to vote) for the election of certain candidates for public office, such conduct constituting a felony under the Corrupt Practices Act. (Gen. Stat. 1915, §§ 4342, 4343). A preliminary examination was held before a justice of the peace, by whom he was required to give bond to answer the charge. In the district court the county attorney asked to be relieved from filing information for the reason, among others, that there was not sufficient evidence in his possession to warrant a prosecution. The court made an order granting the request, and the case was dismissed. The complaining witness then applied to other justices of the peace to issue a warrant on a complaint charging the same offenses. Two of them refused to do so, but a third issued a warrant and held an examination, resulting in the discharge of the defendant for want of evidence. A similar complaint was then filed with another justice of the peace, Johnson Wade, who issued a warrant upon which Foley was again arrested. The county attorney filed a written motion asking, and undertaking to direct, that the case be dismissed. The justice of the peace overruled the motion. Foley then brought an action in the district court against the justice of the peace (Wade), the complaining witness, T. B. Ham, and his attorney, A. D. Neale, asking that further proceedings before the justice be forbidden. Issues were joined, evidence was taken, and judgment was rendered in accordance with the prayer of the petition. The defendants appeal.

1. So far as concerns the justice of the peace, the case amounts to an application for a writ of prohibition (or for a judgment or order in the nature of such a writ) forbidding further proceedings in the criminal case on the ground that the county attorney had full right to control the matter, and his direction for a dismissal should have been given effect. The first inquiry is as to the extent of the power of the county attorney in that respect. It is said that the public prosecutor, except as restrained by statute, has absolute control of criminal prosecutions, and has authority, in virtue of his office, to enter a nolle prosequi—a virtual dismissal—regardless of the attitude of the court. 32 Cyc. 713; 2 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. § 1388; People ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. District Ct. 23 Colo. 466, 48 Pac. 500. The practice in that respect, however, is not uniform in the different jurisdictions. Notes in 35 L.R.A. 701, and 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1123. Our statute recognizes the county attorney's right under ordinary circumstances to refuse to prosecute, by providing that in extreme cases the court may compel him to file an information. Gen. Stat. 1915, § 7981 (Code Crim. Proc. § 71). And his need to exercise discretion in determining whether prosecutions shall be brought is made the ground of exempting him from civil liability for wrongfully instituting them. Smith v. Parman, 101 Kan. 115, L.R.A.1917F, 698, 165 Pac. 663. He is made the representative of the state in litigation "in the several courts" of his county to which it is a party. Gen. Stat. 1915, § 2620. He is required to take charge of a preliminary examination in a felony case only when requested to do so by the magistrate. Gen. Stat. 1915, § 2624. The statute contemplates that criminal prosecutions may be instituted, not only without his participation, but without his knowledge; provision being made for the protection of the public against costs in such cases, except upon his statement that prior consultation with him was impracticable. Gen. Stat. 1915, § 4753.

Under statutes quite similar to ours, it has been held that a court may by mandamus compel a sheriff to serve a warrant in a felony case, notwithstanding the county attorney had instructed him not to do so. Beecher v. Anderson, 45 Mich. 543, 8 N. W. 539. This decision has been cited in support of the doctrine that the county attorney does not have absolute control of a criminal case. 32 Cyc. 714; 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 275. It is based, however, upon the conclusion that in the statute making it his duty to "appear for the state or county, and prosecute or defend in all the courts of the county, all prosecutions, suits, applications, and motions, whether civil or criminal, in which the state or county may be a party or interested," the phrase, "the courts of the county" is intended to refer only to courts of record. In a situation closely analogous to that presented in the Michigan case, this court held that the direction of the county attorney was controlling. A warrant charging a felony was placed in the hands of the sheriff. The county attorney directed him to return it, and he did so. More than two years later the defendant was arrested upon the same warrant and claimed the benefit of the Statute of Limitations. The question presented was whether the prosecution was to be regarded as pending between the return of the warrant already referred to and its reissuance, and this was treated as depending upon the power of the county attorney to control it. This court held that the bar of the statute had fallen, saying: "The county attorney is the representative of the state in criminal prosecutions, and, subject only to a limited direction by the court, controls such actions. . . . And when the sheriff, by the direction of the county attorney, returns a warrant which has been placed in his hands for service to the court that issued it, this ends the official connection of the sheriff with such warrant, renders the warrant functus officio, and effects an abandonment of the prosecution by the state." Re Broadhead, 74 Kan. 401, 405, 86 Pac. 458.

Notwithstanding that the county attorney is not required to attend a preliminary examination unless asked to do so, we hold that he may appear if he sees fit, and when he does his authority is as complete as though his presence had been requested. The proceeding, while somewhat informal, is an adversary one. It is accusatory or litigious, rather than inquisitorial in character. It has something of the aspect of a voluntary investigation conducted by the magistrate, while exercising a function somewhat analogous to that of a grand jury, to determine whether or not there is ground for a prosecution. But under our practice it is quite different from that. It constitutes actual litigation between opposing parties. Testimony taken at such a hearing may be used at the trial in the district court, if the attendance of the witness cannot be had (State v. Chadwell, 94 Kan. 302, 146 Pac. 420; 8 R. C. L. 213, 214),—a course which could scarcely be justified if the proceeding were not essentially judicial,—a trial between opposing parties presided over by a judge.

The state is the plaintiff, and the state's attorney, rather than the complaining witness or any other unofficial person, is entitled to speak in its behalf, and decide upon the course to be pursued in its interest.

"Unquestionably, a private individual has no longer any right to prosecute another for crime,—no right to control any criminal prosecution when once instituted. A criminal prosecution is a state affair, and the control of it is in the public prosecutor. . . . The purpose of a public prosecution is to prevent the use of the criminal law to gratify private malice or accomplish personal gain. This purpose is fully subserved when the control of the case is with the county attorney." State v. Wilson, 24 Kan. 189, 192, 36 Am. Rep. 257.

"The law makes it the duty of the county attorney to conduct criminal prosecutions on behalf of the state, and all steps in the trial are alike under his supervision and control." State v. Wells, 54 Kan. 161, 165, 37 Pac. 1007.

"No one but the county attorney, or the attorney general on proper occasions, or persons deputed by them, may control prosecutions within a county." State ex rel. Thomas v. Snelling, 71 Kan. 499, 506, 80 Pac. 968.

It is true that this interpretation of the law places in the hands of the county attorney a very large power, which is susceptible of abuse. That, however, is a necessary attribute of most governmental powers. In the case of a public officer some protection is afforded by statutes making official misconduct a crime (Gen. Stat. 1915, § 3588) and a basis for ouster (Gen. Stat. 1915, § 7603; Code Civ. Proc. § 686a). The other theory—that the control of a felony prosecution until it reaches the district court, so far as a plaintiff may exercise control, rests with the prosecuting witness, or with anyone who is under no official responsibility—would imply that the county attorney might be seriously embarrassed in the attempted enforcement of the criminal law by the interference of individuals, actuated by mistaken judgment or perverse purpose. For instance, a private prosecutor, if in charge of a preliminary examination upon a charge of gambling, might call the keeper of the gaming house and permit him to give such testimony as, under the statute (Gen. Stat. 1915, § 3652), would result in his own complete immunity. Clearly the selection of witnesses to be used in that manner should rest with the county attorney, and not with individuals or with the justice of the peace. The power effectively to control a prosecution involves the power to determine when and before what tribunal it shall be brought and maintained, and therefore whether it should be discontinued. We conclude that the justice of the peace should have acted upon the direction of the county attorney and dismissed the case.

Two Federal cases militate somewhat against this conclusion, but they are based upon statutes not entirely like those of Kansas. United States v. Schumann, 2 Abb. U. S. 523, 5 Sawy. 439, Fed. Cas. No. 16,235; United States v. Scroggins, 3 Woods, 529, Fed. Cas. No. 16,244.

2. It is contended that, even if the justice of the peace ought to have dismissed the case upon the direction of the county attorney, his refusal to do so was a mere error for which prohibition is not an available remedy. It is doubtless true that, upon the filing of the motion to dismiss, the justice did not lose jurisdiction in such sense as to render absolutely void everything that he thereafter did in the case. Prohibition is frequently spoken of as properly invoked only where it is sought to restrain a judicial officer from an act wholly beyond his jurisdiction. But expressions indicating some modification of this are not uncommon. Thus it is said that "the writ will lie in all cases either of abuse or usurpation of jurisdiction by an inferior tribunal." 32 Cyc. 604.

And that "three conditions are necessary to warrant the granting of the relief: First, that the court, officer, or person against whom it is sought is about to exercise judicial or quasi judicial power; second, that the exercise of such power is unauthorized by law; third, that it will result in injury for which no other adequate remedy exists." High, Extr. Leg. Rem. § 764a.

In practice the writ is often used to prevent an act which, in a strict technical sense, is within the jurisdiction of the officer, but contrary to law,—one which he has the power to perform, but not the legal right. Thus in a recent textbook it is said: "The doctrine is universally held that a judge who has an interest in the subject-matter of the litigation is disqualified from hearing and adjudging the case, and, where he attempts to do so, prohibition will be granted to restrain him." 2 Bailey, Habeas Corpus, § 360.

See also State ex rel. Jones v. Gay, 65 Wash. 629, 118 Pac. 830.

Yet the disqualified judge is not wholly without jurisdiction, and if he acts the resulting judgment is not void, nor open to collateral attack. Jones v. Williamsburg City F. Ins. Co. 85 Kan. 235, 116 Pac. 484. Merely by way of illustration, it may be mentioned that the writ has been successfully invoked to correct an order requiring the production of records at an unreasonable place (Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Hardin, 166 Ky. 51, 178 S. W. 1155); to stay proceedings before a judge who had declared his intention to rule in a particular way (Cullins v. Williams, 156 Ky. 57, 160 S. W. 733); to enforce the rule of res judicata (State ex rel. Burr v. Whitney, 66 Fla. 24, 63 So. 299; State ex rel. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Williams, 221 Mo. 227, 120 S. W. 740); to restrain the hearing of a will contest because it was brought too late (State ex rel. Wood v. Superior Ct. 76 Wash. 27, 135 Pac. 494; McVey v. Butcher, 72 W. Va. 526, 78 S. E. 691); to prevent the taking of evidence on matters not pertinent to the issue (Miller v. Superior Ct. 25 Cal. App. 607, 144 Pac. 978); to prevent the splitting of a cause of action (Bullard v. Thorpe, 66 Vt. 599, 25 L.R.A. 605, 44 Am. St. Rep. 867, 30 Atl. 36); and even to prevent separate actions upon several notes of the defendant (James v. Stokes, 77 Va. 225).

The district court, besides having general original jurisdiction of all matters not otherwise provided for, and jurisdiction in cases of appeal and error from all inferior courts and tribunals, is specifically given by the statute "a general supervision and control of all such inferior courts and tribunals, to prevent and correct errors and abuses." Gen. Stat. 1915, § 2957. The clause quoted can hardly be regarded as referring only to appellate jurisdiction, because that had already been provided for, and because the phrase "to prevent . . . errors and abuses" points to a preventive, and not a corrective, remedy. If it was the duty of the justice of the peace to dismiss the criminal case upon the motion of the county attorney (and we have determined that it was), he acted beyond his legal authority in going ahead with the hearing, and we think that prohibition was an appropriate method by which to require him to conform to the direction which we have decided the public prosecutor had a right to give.

It is true the plaintiff in this case might have submitted to the preliminary examination and given bond, if required to do so, for his appearance in the district court, and awaited his discharge upon the refusal of the county attorney to file an information; but that remedy manifestly might have been far from adequate.

3. A suggestion is made that the plaintiff had no right to resort to prohibition because he had not first invoked relief at the hands of the justice of the peace. When the justice had refused to dismiss the prosecution at the instance of the county attorney, a similar request by the accused would obviously have been a mere formality, the futility of which is demonstrated by the defense made in the district court on the ground that the county attorney did not have control of the case. State ex rel. McEntee v. Bright, 224 Mo. 514, 135 Am. St. Rep. 552, 123 S. W. 1057, 20 Ann. Cas. 955, 19 Ann. Cas. 1210.

4. In the first proceeding against Foley the docket of the justice did not recite findings that an offense had been committed and that there was probable cause to believe him guilty,—facts that the statute requires to be shown in order to warrant binding him over. This is referred to by the defendants in this action as casting a doubt upon the jurisdiction of the district court in that case. The transcript showed that Foley was required to give bond for his appearance in the district court for trial, and this, with the giving of the bond, was sufficient for jurisdictional purposes. State v. Tennison, 39 Kan. 726, 18 Pac. 948.

5. The decision that the order against the justice of the peace was properly granted renders of little practical consequence the question whether error was committed in rendering judgment against the individual defendants. As to them the action was one of injunction, and was maintainable for the same reasons that justified the prohibition against the officer, unless by reason of the rule which has sometimes been announced, that injunction against the pros-execution of a criminal action will not lie except for the protection of property rights. 22 Cyc. 904; 14 R. C. L. 428. This rule seems to be founded on these considerations: The accused has usually a fairly adequate remedy by making his defense in the criminal action; a court of equity has no jurisdiction of criminal matters, that subject being committed to courts of law; as a matter of public policy the courts ought not to interfere with the representatives of the public seeking the enforcement of the law. In the case of numerous, repeated, and vexatious prosecutions, it is evident that the remedy of meeting the charges in the courts where they are brought may not be entirely adequate; where the same court has jurisdiction of legal and equitable matters distinctions founded on that difference are of little importance; and with respect to an injunction which runs not against the public prosecutor, but against individuals who seek to direct the machinery of the criminal law in opposition to his judgment, the objection based on a reluctance to embarrass officers in discharging their duty to the government does not apply. A court of equity would seem to be as responsive to a call for the protection of personal rights, in an appropriate case, as to one for the protection of rights relating to property. In Brown v. Nichols, 93 Kan. 737, L.R.A. 1915D, 327, 145 Pac. 561, it is said: "The remedy of injunction may be employed to protect personal and property rights, although it may operate incidentally to restrain a prosecution under an invalid ordinance." Syllabus, ¶ 2.

The case on its merits was decided upon oral evidence, and any debatable inferences of fact must be resolved in favor of the plaintiff. So far as the decision turns upon the exercise of discretion, the action of the District Court must control. We conclude that no error is shown in any part of the court's order.

The judgment is affirmed.

Annotation—Right of public prosecutor to have preliminary examination before magistrate dismissed.

There seems to be little in the books on this subject and the courts are not agreed upon it. The power of a public prosecutor to dismiss a prosecution after indictment or information is discussed in the notes in 35 L.R.A. 701, and 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1123.

The United States district attorney has no power to have a criminal examination before a United States commissioner dismissed. United States v. Schumann (1866) 2 Abb. U. S. 523, 5 Sawy. 439, Fed. Cas. No. 16,235, where Field, J., said: "The district attorney may appear before the commissioner and attend to the presentation of the evidence, but in that position he is only counsel of the government; he cannot direct what finding the magistrate shall make, nor what course he shall pursue. The magistrate will, indeed, in any case, hesitate to continue an investigation after the prosecution has been abandoned by the legal officer of the government. Still, there may be cases where he will be justified, and more, bound to take such a course."

And the United States district attorney may not take away from the marshal a warrant issued by a United States commissioner, to determine whether it should be executed or not. United States v. Scroggins (1879) 3 Woods, 529, Fed. Cas. No. 16,244. L.R.A.1918C.

Similarly, it was held in Beecher v. Anderson (1881) 45 Mich. 543, 8 N. W. 539, (referred to in FOLEY v. HAM, ante, 205), that the sheriff must serve a warrant in a felony case, although the public prosecutor instructed him not to do so. In this case, where the statute did not require the prosecuting attorney to appear to prosecute complaints before a magistrate except where the magistrate requested it, the court said: "No doubt when he [the prosecuting attorney] appears the magistrate should govern his official action somewhat by his advice; he certainly ought very seldom to hold a party to bail or to convict him on trial when the prosecuting attorney in good faith advises him that no crime is made out. It would be proper, also, in many cases that he should seek the advice of the prosecuting attorney in advance of the issue of any warrant, and refuse a warrant even when the complainant is able to make prima facie showing of a technical offense, if the prosecuting attorney is of the opinion that the case would fail on full hearing, or that the criminal intent was so far wanting that the cause of justice would not be advanced by the prosecution."

In Jamnet v. Monroe County (1889) 77 Mich. 245, 43 N. W. 910, it was held that the county board may not refuse to allow the fees of a justice of the peace in a criminal proceeding because he proceeded without the approval of the prosecuting attorney.

A magistrate may not refuse to issue a warrant upon the ground simply that the district attorney has refused to make a complaint, where the statute provides that "he shall examine on oath the complainant, and any witness provided by him, and shall reduce the complaint to writing, and shall cause the same to be subscribed by the complainant; and if it shall appear that any offense has been committed of which the superior court has exclusive jurisdiction, the magistrate shall issue a warrant reciting the substance of the accusation." State ex rel. Romano v. Yahey (1906) 43 Wash. 15, 85 Pac. 990, 9 Ann. Cas. 1071, where the court said: "It is the duty of every magistrate to see that false charges are not preferred against the innocent, and that criminal process is not resorted to, to subserve personal or private ends; but it is equally his duty to see that the guilty are brought to judgment. He may consult and advise with the prosecuting attorney, and it is proper that he should do so, especially where questions of law are involved, but, in the end, he must determine for himself whether an offense has been committed of which the superior court has exclusive jurisdiction, and, if he so finds, he must issue his warrant, whether the prosecuting attorney assents or dissents."

On the other hand, FOLEY v. HAM is supported by the decision in Re Broadhead (1906) 74 Kan. 401, 86 Pac. 458, holding that "when a warrant which has been issued by a justice of the peace on a complaint charging the person whom the warrant commands the sheriff to arrest with a felony is delivered to a sheriff for service, and the sheriff thereafter, by direction of the county attorney, returns the warrant 'not found,' and files the same with the justice who issued it, such warrant thereupon becomes functus officio."

In Ex parte Claunch (1879) 71 Mo. 233, it was held that it was perfectly competent for the prosecuting attorney, as the representative of the state, to dismiss, against the will of a justice of the peace, a prosecution commenced before such justice for homicide, as the affidavit filed before him was, in the opinion of the prosecuting attorney, defective in failing to charge murder in the first degree.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

CHARLES H. BUCHANAN, Plff. in Err.,
v.

Statutes — who may question.

1. A white person who has sold land to a colored person under a contract providing that the purchaser shall not be required to accept a deed unless he shall have a right, under the laws of the city and state, to occupy the same as a residence, may, in an action by him to compel the specific performance of the contract, attack the constitutionality of a city ordinance which prohibits the purchase of such land by a colored person.

For other cases, see Statutes, I. c, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Courts — interference with police power.

2. The exercise of the police power will not be interfered with by the courts where it is within the scope of legislative authority and the means adopted reasonably tend to accomplish a lawful purpose, but such power cannot justify the passage of a law or ordinance which runs counter to the limitations of the Federal Constitution.

For other cases, see Courts, I. c, 2, b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Civil rights — colored person's right to purchase property.

3. A colored person has the right to acquire property without state legislation discriminating against him solely because of color, under U. S. Const. 14th Amend., providing that no state shall deprive any person of liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person the equal protection of the laws, and the Act of Congress of April 9, 1866, providing that all "citizens of the United States" shall have the same right in every state and territory as is enjoyed by white citizens thereof to "purchase" real and personal property.

For other cases, see Civil Rights, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Note. — As to validity of segregation statute or ordinance prohibiting persons of different race or color from living in same locality, see annotation following this case, post, 220.

The question, who may raise the objection L.R.A. 1918C.

that a statute contains an unconstitutional discrimination, is considered in the note to Pugh v. Pugh, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 954; and see later case, People v. Crane, L.R.A. 1916D, 550.

Constitutional law — colored person's right to purchase property.

4. A city ordinance which prevents the occupancy of a lot by a colored person in a block where a majority of the residences are occupied by white persons, thereby preventing white persons in such block from selling property therein to negroes for residence purposes, is not a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, II. c, 3, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — prohibition against purchase of land by colored persons.

5. A city ordinance prohibiting colored persons from occupying as residences any house in any block in which the majority of residences are occupied by white people, thereby preventing white persons in such blocks from selling property to colored people for residence purposes, violates the constitutional prohibition against interference with property rights except by due process of law, and cannot be sustained on the ground that it will promote the public peace by preventing race conflicts, or that the acquisition of property in such blocks by colored persons for residence purposes will cause the depreciation in value of property in the neighborhood owned by white persons.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, II. b, 5, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(November 5, 1917.)

ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the State of Kentucky to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Chancery Branch of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of defendant in an action brought to compel specific performance of a contract for the sale of certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Clayton B. Blakey and Moorfield Storey, for plaintiff in error:

The presumption that the ordinance was enacted in good faith for the purposes declared fails when it is obvious that the real purposes were very different from those which are declared.

Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S. 219, 55 L. ed. 191, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 145.

Among the rights and privileges of the citizen which are fundamental is the right to acquire and possess property of every kind.

Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. 371, Fed. Cas. No. 3230; Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 76, 21 L. ed. 394, 408.

The ordinance is an attempt to deprive the negro of the rights which belong to every citizen simply because white men consider him inferior by reason of his race and color. It was to protect him against precisely such consequences of race prejudice that the 14th Amendment was passed.

In determining whether a legislative enactment of this character is or is not reasonable, courts will look to the purpose of the statute, and determine from the natural effect of such statutes when put into operation, and not from their proclaimed purpose.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

Buchanan, plaintiff in error, brought an action in the chancery branch of Jefferson circuit court of Kentucky for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of certain real estate situated in the city of Louisville at the corner of 37th street and Pflanz avenue. The offer in writing to purchase the property contained a proviso:

"It is understood that I am purchasing the above property for the purpose of having erected thereon a house which I propose to make my residence, and it is a distinct part of this agreement that I shall not be required to accept a deed to the above property or to pay for said property unless I have the right, under the L.R.A.1918C.

laws of the state of Kentucky and the city of Louisville, to occupy said property as a residence." This offer was accepted by the plaintiff.

To the action for specific performance the defendant, by way of answer, set up the condition above set forth, that he is a colored person, and that on the block of which the lot in controversy is a part, there are ten residences, eight of which, at the time of the making of the contract, were occupied by white people, and only two (those nearest the lot in question) were occupied by colored people, and that, under and by virtue of the ordinance of the city of Louisville, approved May 11, 1914, he would not be allowed to occupy the lot as a place of residence.

In reply to this answer the plaintiff set up, among other things, that the ordinance was in conflict with the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and hence no defense to the action for specific performance of the contract.

In the court of original jurisdiction in Kentucky, and in the court of appeals of that state, the case was made to turn upon the constitutional validity of the ordinance. The court of appeals of Kentucky (165 Ky. 559, 177 S. W. 472, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 149) held the ordinance valid and of itself a complete defense to the action.

The title of the ordinance is: "An ordinance to prevent conflict and ill feeling between the white and colored races in the city of Louisville, and preserve the public peace and promote the general welfare by making reasonable provisions requiring as far as practicable, the use of separate blocks for residences, places of abode, and places of assembly by white and colored people respectively."

By the 1st section of the ordinance it is made unlawful for any colored person to move into and occupy as a residence, place of abode, or to establish and maintain as a place of public assembly, any house upon any block upon which a greater number of houses are occupied as residences, places of abode, or places of public assembly by white people than are occupied as residences, places of abode, or places of public assembly by colored people.

Section 2 provides that it shall be unlawful for any white person to move into and occupy as a residence, place of abode, or to establish and maintain as a place of public assembly, any house upon any block upon which a greater number of houses are occupied as residences, places of abode, or places of public assembly by colored people than are occupied as residences, places of abode, or places of public assembly by white people.

Section 4 provides that nothing in the ordinance shall affect the location of residences, places of abode, or places of assembly made previous to its approval; that nothing contained therein shall be construed so as to prevent the occupancy of residences, places of abode, or places of assembly by white or colored servants or employees of occupants of such residences, places of abode, or places of public assembly on the block on which they are so employed, and that nothing therein contained shall be construed to prevent any person who, at the date of the passage of the ordinance, shall have acquired or possessed the right to occupy any building as a residence, place of abode, or place of assembly from exercising such a right; that nothing contained in the ordinance shall prevent the owner of any building, who, when the ordinance became effective, leased, rented, or occupied it as a residence, place of abode, or place of public assembly for colored persons, from continuing to rent, lease, or occupy such residence, place of abode or place of assembly for such persons, if the owner shall so desire; but if such house should, after the passage of the ordinance, be at any time leased, rented, or occupied as a residence, place of abode, or place of assembly for white persons, it shall not thereafter be used for colored persons, if such occupation would then be a violation of § 1 of the ordinance; that nothing contained in the ordinance shall prevent the owner of any building, who, when the ordinance became effective, leased, rented, or occupied it as a residence, place of abode, or place of assembly for white persons, from continuing to rent, lease, or occupy such residence, place of abode, or place of assembly for such purpose, if the owner shall so desire, but if such household, after the passage of the ordinance, be at any time leased, rented, or occupied as a residence, place of abode, or place of assembly for colored persons, then it shall not thereafter be used for white persons, if such occupation would then be a violation of § 2 thereof.

The ordinance contains other sections and a violation of its provisions is made an offense.

The assignments of error in this court attack the ordinance upon the ground that it violates the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, in that it abridges the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States to acquire and enjoy property, takes property without due process of law, and denies equal protection of the laws.

The objection is made that this writ of error should be dismissed because the L.R.A.1918C.

alleged denial of constitutional rights involves only the rights of colored persons, and the plaintiff in error is a white person. This court has frequently held that while an unconstitutional act is no law, attacks upon the validity of laws can only be entertained when made by those whose rights are directly affected by the law or ordinance in question. Only such persons, it has been settled, can be heard to attack the constitutionality of the law or ordinance. But this case does not run counter to that principle.

The property here involved was sold by the plaintiff in error, a white man, on the terms stated, to a colored man; the action for specific performance was entertained in the court below, and in both courts the plaintiff's right to have the contract enforced was denied solely because of the effect of the ordinance making it illegal for a colored person to occupy the lot sold. But for the ordinance the state courts would have enforced the contract, and the defendant would have been compelled to pay the purchase price and take a conveyance of the premises. The right of the plaintiff in error to sell his property was directly involved and necessarily impaired because it was held in effect that he could not sell the lot to a person of color who was willing and ready to acquire the property, and had obligated himself to take it. This case does not come within the class wherein this court has held that where one seeks to avoid the enforcement of a law or ordinance he must present a grievance of his own, and not rest the attack upon the alleged violation of another's rights. In this case the property rights of the plaintiff in error are directly and necessarily involved. See Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33, 38, 60 L. ed. 131, 134, L.R.A.1916D, 545, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 7, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 283.

We pass, then, to a consideration of the case upon its merits. This ordinance prevents the occupancy of a lot in the city of Louisville by a person of color in a block where the greater number of residences are occupied by white persons; where such a majority exists, colored persons are excluded. This interdiction is based wholly upon color; simply that, and nothing more. In effect, premises situated as are those in question in the so-called white block are effectively debarred from sale to persons of color, because, if sold, they cannot be occupied by the purchaser nor by him sold to another of the same color.

This drastic measure is sought to be justified under the authority of the state in the exercise of the police power. It is said such legislation tends to promote the public peace by preventing racial conflicts; that it tends to maintain racial purity; that it prevents the deterioration of property owned and occupied by white people, which deterioration, it is contended, is sure to follow the occupancy of adjacent premises by persons of color.

The authority of the state to pass laws in the exercise of the police power, having for their object the promotion of the public health, safety, and welfare, is very broad, as has been affirmed in numerous and recent decisions of this court. Furthermore, the exercise of this power, embracing nearly all legislation of a local character, is not to be interfered with by the courts where it is within the scope of legislative authority and the means adopted reasonably tend to accomplish a lawful purpose. But it is equally well established that the police power, broad as it is, cannot justify the passage of a law or ordinance which runs counter to the limitations of the Federal Constitution; that principle has been so frequently affirmed in this court that we need not stop to cite the cases.

The Federal Constitution and laws passed within its authority are, by the express terms of that instrument, made the supreme law of the land. The 14th Amendment protects life, liberty, and property from invasion by the states without due process of law. Property is more than the mere thing which a person owns. It is elementary that it includes the right to acquire, use, and dispose of it. The Constitution protects these essential attributes of property. Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 391, 42 L. ed. 780, 790, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383. Property consists of the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of a person's acquisitions without control or diminution save by the law of the land. 1 Cooley's Bl. Com. 127.

True it is that dominion over property springing from ownership is not absolute and unqualified. The disposition and use of property may be controlled, in the exercise of the police power, in the interest of the public health, convenience, or welfare. Harmful occupations may be controlled and regulated. Legitimate business may also be regulated in the interest of the public. Certain uses of property may be confined to portions of the municipality other than the residence district, such as livery stables, brickyards, and the like, because of the impairment of the health and comfort of the occupants of neighboring property. Many illustrations might be given from the decisions of this court and other courts, L.R.A.1918C.

The concrete question here is: May the occupancy, and, necessarily, the purchase and sale of property of which occupancy is an incident, be inhibited by the states, or by one of its municipalities, solely because of the color of the proposed occupant of the premises? That one may dispose of his property, subject only to the control of lawful enactments curtailing that right in the public interest, must be conceded. The question now presented makes it pertinent to inquire into the constitutional right of the white man to sell his property to a colored man, having in view the legal status of the purchaser and occupant.

Following the Civil War certain amendments to the Federal Constitution were adopted, which have become an integral part of that instrument, equally binding upon all the states and fixing certain fundamental rights which all are bound to respect. The 13th Amendment abolished slavery in the United States and in all places subject to their jurisdiction, and gave Congress power to enforce the Amendment by appropriate legislation. The 14th Amendment made all persons born or naturalized in the United States, citizens of the United States and of the states in which they reside, and provided that no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, and that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person the equal protection of the laws.

The effect of these Amendments was first dealt with by this court in Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 21 L. ed. 394. The reasons for the adoption of the Amendments were elaborately considered by a court familiar with the times in which the necessity for the Amendments arose and with the circumstances which impelled their adoption. In that case Mr. Justice Miller, who spoke for the majority, pointed out that the colored race, having been freed from slavery by the 13th Amendment, was raised to the dignity of citizenship and equality of civil rights by the 14th Amendment, and the states were prohibited from abridging the privileges and immunities of such citizens, or depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. While a principal purpose of the latter Amendment was to protect persons of color, the broad language used was deemed sufficient to protect all persons, white or black, against discriminatory legislation by the states. This is now the settled law. In many of the cases since arising the question of color has not been involved, and the cases have been decided upon alleged violations of civil or property rights, irrespective of the race or color of the complainant. In Slaughter-House Cases it was recognized that the chief inducement to the passage of the Amendment was the desire to extend Federal protection to the recently emancipated race from unfriendly and discriminating legislation by the states.

In Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, 25 L. ed. 664, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 515, this court held that a colored person charged with an offense was denied due process of law by a statute which prevented colored men from sitting on the jury which tried him. Mr. Justice Strong, speaking for the court, again reviewed the history of the Amendments, and, among other things, in speaking of the 14th Amendment, said:

"It [the 14th Amendment] was designed to assure to the colored race the enjoyment of all the civil rights that, under the law, are enjoyed by white persons, and to give to that race the protection of the general government in that enjoyment, whenever it should be denied by the states. It not only gave citizenship and privileges of citizenship to persons of color, but it denied to any state the power to withhold from them the equal protection of the laws, and authorized Congress to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation. . . . It ordains that no state shall make or enforce any laws which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. . . . It ordains that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

"What is this but declaring that the law in the states shall be the same for the black as for the white,—that all persons, whether colored or white, shall stand equal before the laws of the states, and, in regard to the colored race, for whose protection the Amendment was primarily designed, that no discrimination shall be made against them by law because of their color? . . .

"The 14th Amendment makes no attempt to enumerate the rights it designs to protect. It speaks in general terms and those are as comprehensive as possible. Its language is prohibitory; but every prohibition implies the existence of rights and immunities, prominent among which is an immunity from inequality of legal protection either for life, liberty, or property. Any state action that denies this immunity to a colored man is in conflict with the Constitution."

Again, this court in Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, 347, 25 L. ed. 676, 679, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 547, speaking of the 14th Amendment, said:

"Whoever, by virtue of public position under a state government, deprives another of property, life, or liberty, without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibition; and as he acts in the name and for the state and is clothed with the state's power, his act is that of the state."

In giving legislative aid to these constitutional provisions Congress enacted in 1866 (chap. 31, § 1, 14 Stat. at L. 27, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 3931) that:

"All citizens of the United States shall have the same right in every state and territory, as is enjoyed by white citizens thereof to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property."

And in 1870, by chap. 114, § 16, 16 Stat. at L. 144, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 3925, that:

"All persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every state and territory to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses and exactions of every kind, and no other."

In the face of these constitutional and statutory provisions, can a white man be denied, consistently with due process of law, the right to dispose of his property to a purchaser by prohibiting the occupation of it for the sole reason that the purchaser is a person of color, intending to occupy the premises as a place of residence?

The statute of 1866, originally passed under sanction of the 13th Amendment (14 Stat. at L. 27, chap. 31), and practically re-enacted after the adoption of the 14th Amendment (16 Stat. at L. 144, chap. 114), expressly provided that all citizens of the United States in any state shall have the same right to purchase property as is enjoyed by white citizens. Colored persons are citizens of the United States and have the right to purchase property and enjoy and use the same without laws discriminating against them solely on account of color. Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S. 485, 508, 24 L. ed. 547, 555. These enactments did not deal with the social rights of men, but with those fundamental rights in property which it was intended to secure upon the same terms to citizens of every race and color. Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 3, 22, 27 L. ed. 835, 843, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 18. The 14th Amendment and these statutes enacted in furtherance of its purpose operate to qualify and entitle a colored man to acquire property without state legislation discriminating against him solely because of color.

The defendant in error insists that Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 41 L. ed. 256, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1138, is controlling in principle in favor of the judgment of the court below. In that case this court held that a provision of a statute of Louisiana requiring railway companies carrying passengers to provide in their coaches equal but separate accommodations for the white and colored races did not run counter to the provisions of the 14th Amendment. It is to be observed that in that case there was no attempt to deprive persons of color of transportation in the coaches of the public carrier, and the express requirements were for equal though separate accommodations for the white and colored races. In Plessy v. Ferguson, classification of accommodations was permitted upon the basis of equality for both races.

In the Berea College Case, 211 U. S. 45, 53 L. ed. 81, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 33, a state statute was sustained in the courts of Kentucky, which, while permitting the education of white persons and negroes in different localities by the same incorporated institution, prohibited their attendance at the same place, and in this court the judgment of the court of appeals of Kentucky was affirmed solely upon the reserved authority of the legislature of Kentucky to alter, amend, or repeal charters of its own corporations, and the question here involved was neither discussed nor decided.

In Carey v. Atlanta, 143 Ga. 192, L.R.A. 1915D, 684, 84 S. E. 456, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 1151, the supreme court of Georgia, holding an ordinance, similar in principle to the one herein involved, to be invalid, dealt with Plessy v. Ferguson and the Berea College Case in language so apposite that we quote a portion of it:

"In each instance the complaining person was afforded the opportunity to ride, or to attend institutions of learning, or afforded the thing of whatever nature to which in the particular case he was entitled. The most that was done was to require him, as a member of a class, to conform with reasonable rules in regard to the separation of the races. In none of them was he denied the right to use, control, or dispose of his property, as in this case. Property of a person, whether as a member of a class or as an individual, cannot be taken without due process of law. In the recent case L.R.A.1918C.

of McCabe v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 235 U. S. 151, 59 L. ed. 169, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 69, where the court had under consideration a statute which allowed railroad companies to furnish dining cars for white people and to refuse to furnish dining cars altogether for colored persons, this language was used in reference to the contentions of the attorney general; 'This argument with respect to volume of traffic seems to us to be without merit. It makes the constitutional right depend upon the number of persons who may be discriminated against, whereas the essence of the constitutional right is that it is a personal one.' . . .

"The effect of the ordinance under consideration was not merely to regulate a business or the like, but was to destroy the right of the individual to acquire, enjoy, and dispose of his property. Being of this character it was void as being opposed to the due-process clause of the Constitution."

That there exists a serious and difficult problem arising from a feeling of race hostility which the law is powerless to control, and to which it must give a measure of consideration, may be freely admitted. But its solution cannot be promoted by depriving citizens of their constitutional rights and privileges.

As we have seen, this court has held laws valid which separated the races on the basis of equal accommodations in public conveyances, and courts of high authority have held enactments lawful which provide for separation in the public schools of white and colored pupils where equal privileges are given. But, in view of the rights secured by the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, such legislation must have its limitations, and cannot be sustained where the exercise of authority exceeds the restraints of the Constitution. We think these limitations are exceeded in laws and ordinances of the character now before us.

It is the purpose of such enactments, and it is frankly avowed it will be their ultimate effect, to require by law, at least in residential districts, the compulsory separation of the races on account of color. Such action is said to be essential to the maintenance of the purity of the races, although it is to be noted in the ordinance under consideration that the employment of colored servants in white families is permitted, and near-by residences of colored persons not coming within the blocks, as defined in the ordinance, are not prohibited.

The case presented does not deal with an attempt to prohibit the amalgamation of the races. The right which the ordinance annulled was the civil right of a white man to dispose of his property if he saw fit to do so to a person of color, and of a colored person to make such disposition to a white person.

It is urged that this proposed segregation will promote the public peace by preventing race conflicts. Desirable as this is, and important as is the preservation of the public peace, this aim cannot be accomplished by laws or ordinances which deny rights created or protected by the Federal Constitution.

It is said that such acquisitions by colored persons depreciate property owned in the neighborhood by white persons. But property may be acquired by undesirable white neighbors, or put to disagreeable though lawful uses with like results.

We think this attempt to prevent the alienation of the property in question to a person of color was not a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state, and is in direct violation of the fundamental law enacted in the 14th Amendment of the Constitution preventing state interference with property rights except by due process of law. That being the case, the ordinance cannot stand. Booth v. Illinois, 184 U. S. 425, 429, 46 L. ed. 623, 626, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 425; Otis v. Parker, 187 U. S. 606, 609, 47 L. ed. 323, 327, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 168.

Reaching this conclusion it follows that the judgment of the Kentucky Court of Appeals must be reversed, and the cause remanded to that court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Annotation—Validity of segregation statute or ordinance prohibiting persons of different race or color from living in same locality.

The earlier cases passing upon this question are presented in the notes to State v. Gurry, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1087, and Carey v. Atlanta, L.R.A.1915D, 684.

The decision of the United States Supreme Court in BUCHANAN v. WARLEY, ante, 210, reversing Kentucky court of appeals (1915) 165 Ky. 559, 177 S. W. 472, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 149, establishes the invalidity of laws providing for the segregation of persons in residential districts solely on the ground of race or color under the United States Constitution and the Federal statutes, and practically overrules the decisions in State v. Gurry (1913) 121 Md. 534, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1087, 88 Atl. 546, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 957; Ashland v. Coleman (1913) 19 Va. L. APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pierce County dismissing an action brought to recover the balance alleged to be due for lumber sold and delivered by plaintiff to an alleged agent of defendants. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Morgan & Brewer, for appellant:

Whether Steele was an agent for the defendants or not, when they discovered, as they did discover late in the fall and before the last of this lumber was furnished, that it was being charged to their account, it was their duty to immediately notify plaintiff.

Mr. C. M. Riddell for respondents.

Main, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The purpose of this action was to recover the balance claimed to be due for lumber sold and delivered. The defendants denied liability, the cause was tried to the court without a jury, and resulted in a judgment dismissing the action. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

The facts are these: The appellant is engaged in the lumber business at Hoquiam. The respondents, under the firm name of Cornell Brothers, were engaged in the contracting business, with their principal office in the city of Tacoma. During the summer of the year 1914 the Northwestern Mausoleum Company or the Mausoleum Sales Company of Seattle was constructing a mausoleum in the city of Hoquiam. One W. K. Steele, an engineer, was superintendent of the construction. From time to time during the three or four years previous Steele had been employed as an engineer by the respondents, and in this capacity during the early part of the year 1913 superintended certain construction work in the city of Hoquiam which the respondents were doing for the appellants. When Steele went to Hoquiam for the purpose of superintending the construction of the mausoleum, he visited the office of appellant and desired to arrange to purchase lumber for that purpose. He stated that Cornell Brothers were about to construct a mausoleum in Hoquiam, and that he desired to purchase lumber upon their credit. This credit was extended, and, upon orders from Steele, lumber, from time to time, was delivered by the appellant.

The appellant's evidence, if true, shows that the original invoices, as the lumber was delivered, were mailed to Cornell Brothers at Tacoma, and the duplicates were mailed to Steele in Hoquiam. E. C. Cornell, a member of the firm of Cornell Brothers, testified that that firm did not receive the invoices. The mausoleum was to be constructed under the supervision of E. C. Cornell, representing the respondents, and for this the respondents were to receive 10 per cent of the money expended for labor and material in the construction thereof. From time to time, after the work was begun, Steele would mail to the respondents a statement of the amount due for labor and material, and the respondents in turn would mail these statements to the mausoleum company, that company would draw its check for the amount payable to the respondents, who thereupon would remit to Steele. In the construction work the respondents furnished a concrete mixer and some other equipment. During the time the work was being prosecuted E. C. Cornell visited Hoquiam and examined it three or four times. Before the mausoleum was completed the company which was constructing it transferred Steele to Bellingham, where it was constructing another mausoleum. After Steele left Hoquiam, E. C. Cornell went there to superintend the completion of the mausoleum. This was during the late fall of the year 1913. The last lumber purchased was on December 4th of that year. While E. C. Cornell was at Hoquiam superintending the completion of the work, he learned that the lumber had been charged to Cornell Brothers. He did not at that time advise the appellant that his firm would not be responsible for the lumber and repudiate the account. After the work was completed and Cornell had returned to Tacoma, some correspondence took place between him and the appellant, and, as late as May 24, 1914, in the correspondence, Cornell did not repudiate the account, but stated that he was using every effort to have the mausoleum company take care of it. Six or eight months after E. C. Cornell learned that the lumber had been charged to his firm, the account was repudiated and the present action begun to recover $311.69, the balance due on the account. Cornell denied that Steele was the agent of his firm in constructing the mausoleum, or in purchasing the lumber. It is unnecessary here to determine whether this denial would overcome the inference of agency from the other facts, because, assuming that Steele was not the agent of Cornell Brothers, it does not necessarily follow that the appellant is not entitled to recover from the respondents. When E. C. Cornell learned that the lumber had been charged to his firm, it became his duty within a reasonable time to notify the appellant that the account was charged without authority, and was therefore repudiated. Failing in this, the law is that the account is ratified where prejudice has resulted by failure to repudiate the account within a reasonable time. Saveland v. Green, 40 Wis. 431; Heyn v. O'Hagen, 60 Mich. 150, 28 N. W. 861.

In this case, had Cornell Brothers repudiated the account when they first learned that it was charged to them, the remedy by lien would have been then available to the appellant. When they repudiated the account the time in which a lien could be claimed had expired, and the appellant was thereby prejudiced by the delay. The account was not repudiated within a reasonable time.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to enter a judgment in favor of the appellant.

Ellis, Ch. J., and Parker and Webster, JJ., concur. Fullerton, J., concurs in the result.

Annotation—Ratification of the unauthorized act of an agent by silence.

The present note is confined to an examination of the abstract principles underlying the ratification of the unauthorized act of an agent by the silence of the principal. So far as possible the note has been limited to cases which present no affirmative act of ratification on the part of the principal, the attempt being to determine how far the mere silence of the principal amounts to a ratification. Ratification as between the agent and the principal has been excluded.

In order to understand the principles underlying the subject of this discussion, it is necessary to distinguish at the outset between ratification and estoppel. "The substance of estoppel is the inducement to another to act to his prejudice. The substance of ratification is confirmation after conduct."<sup>1</sup> Ratification is a matter of intention; its existence is a question of fact; in order that there be a ratification there must be a voluntary assumption of the unauthorized act on full information;<sup>2</sup> a ratification of the unauthorized act of an agent, or of a stranger who claims to act as agent, must be found, if it exists, "in the intention of the principal, either express or implied."<sup>3</sup> Estoppel, on the other hand, results from conduct which leads the party dealing with the agent to act to his prejudice.<sup>4</sup> It has been stated that the distinction between being bound by reason of ratification and being bound by an estoppel "is very wide. In the former case the party is bound because he intended to be; in the latter he is bound notwithstanding there was no such intention, because the other party will be prejudiced and defrauded by his conduct unless the law treat him as legally bound."<sup>5</sup>

It is clear, therefore, that there cannot be an estoppel without some prejudice, and this is the view that has been taken.<sup>6</sup> But ratification does not rest upon prejudice.

The courts, however, have not always kept the distinction between ratification and estoppel; some cases have held that silence does not amount to a ratification unless there is some prejudice. It has been stated that "where there is no element of estoppel the mere silence of the party does not amount to a ratification."<sup>7</sup> Some cases state the rule as one of a possibility of misleading, as, for example: "When the ratification of an unauthorized act of an agent is sought to be inferred from the silence or conduct of his principal in favor of a third person, it must clearly appear that the latter might have been thereby misled, and induced to forego some advantage he would otherwise have enjoyed."<sup>8</sup> It has been held that ratification of a deed executed by another without authority cannot result from mere silence; a ratification of this act can take place only by way of estoppel.<sup>9</sup>

It is clear, however, that to hold that there can be no ratification without prejudice is confusing ratification with estoppel. Prejudice is no necessary element of ratification. It has been stated that "it does not necessarily follow that one seeking to enforce a liability by ratification, arising from silence, or a failure to repudiate an unauthorized act after knowledge thereof, must also show that by such silence he has been misled to his prejudice, although it is proper to do so, as silence of the alleged principal under such circumstances may of itself be sufficient to establish a ratification of such act."<sup>10</sup>

his agent, remained silent, could be separated from the facts and circumstances under which such silence was maintained, there would be no evidence of an intent on the part of the principal to adopt the unauthorized act, consequently no evidence of ratification. It has been stated that "silence simply in itself is ordinarily no evidence of anything."<sup>11</sup> It has been held that the mere silence of the principal upon hearing of the unauthorized act is not ordinarily to be construed as a ratification in the absence of a showing of special circumstances making it the duty of the principal to speak.<sup>12</sup>

As a practical matter, however, the maintenance of the silence is almost inseparable from the circumstances under which it is maintained. "The conditions under which it [silence] occurs, and accompanying it," says one court, "may show it to be a ratification."<sup>13</sup> These circumstances have been emphasized, and it has been stated that "mere silence, as a general rule, does not prove ratification, but it is merely a circumstance to be considered with others in arriving at a conclusion as to whether a transaction has been ratified or not."<sup>14</sup> It is stated in one case that "where, with a knowledge of the facts, the principal acquiesces in the act of the agent, under such circumstances as would make it his duty to repudiate such acts if he would avoid them, such acquiescence is a confirmation of the acts of the agent."<sup>15</sup> But in a majority of the cases no special stress is laid upon the circumstances; it is held generally that the unauthorized act of an agent may be ratified by mere silence.<sup>16</sup> Whether it has been so ratified is a question for the trier of facts,—usually the jury; ratification may be found to exist where the principal has merely remained silent.<sup>17</sup> "If the principal on being informed of the acts fails to disavow them in a reasonable time," says one court, "his silence may be considered as an acquiescence and assent to the acts done."<sup>18</sup> In such cases the silence is treated as mere evidence of ratification.

While, as above stated, the courts in these cases have not emphasized the circumstances under which the principal has maintained silence, it seems that this element was present, for it is practically impossible, at least it would be unusual, to show the silence of the principal without showing the circumstances under which it was maintained. The circumstances under which the silence is maintained, or the duration thereof, have an important bearing upon ratification. For example, the circumstance of a long-continued silence would be more convincing of an adoption of the unauthorized act than a silence of short duration. It is also true that silence under certain circumstances is more convincing of an acquiescence in the unauthorized act than it is in other circumstances.

It has been held that the jury may find a ratification from an unreasonable delay; that such delay is evidence to be considered by the jury on the question of ratification; but that the court should not instruct the jury to find a ratification in case of unreasonable delay after notice of the facts, but should leave the jury free to act, and to determine from all the facts whether a ratification should be inferred.<sup>19</sup>

Whether silence amounts to ratification has been held to depend upon whether the principal acquires knowledge of the unauthorized act at a time when his election might be attended with advantage to him. It has been stated that where an agent has gone beyond or beside his authority for the benefit, as he supposes, of his principal, and gives him immediate notice, "silence is construed acquiescence and ratification. But a delay of intelligence until an election to approve or disapprove would be attended with no advantage to the principal defeats the right to construe silence into ratification."<sup>20</sup>

Silence which proves ratification must be distinguished from silence as proof of original authority to do what the agent has done. For example, it is stated in some cases that it may be inferred from the silence of the principal that the agent had the power he assumed.<sup>21</sup> This is not a question of ratification, but of original authority.

It is a rule sustained by a large number of cases that a ratification will be presumed from a failure of the principal for an unreasonable time to repudiate the unauthorized act of his agent.<sup>22</sup> The rule of the cases can be best stated by giving extracts from the opinions. It is stated that "if, after knowledge of what the agent had done, the principal made no objection for an unreasonable time, a ratification would result by operation of law."<sup>23</sup> Again, "when the principal is informed of what has been done, he must dissent and give notice in a reasonable time, or otherwise his assent to what has been done will be presumed."<sup>24</sup> Another court states that "in all the varied business transactions of men, wherever the relation of principal and agent exists, it is the duty of the principal to repudiate the unauthorized act of his agent as soon as he reasonably can after it has come to his knowledge, or he will be held to have ratified it."<sup>25</sup> A principal "must disavow the act of his agent within a reasonable time after the fact has come to his knowledge, or he will be deemed to have ratified it."<sup>26</sup> "The principal must, therefore, when informed, reject within a reasonable time, or be deemed to adopt by acquiescence."<sup>27</sup> "Acquiescence or long silence of the principal touching an unauthorized or illegal act of his agent" is "a ratification of the act or contract of the agent."<sup>28</sup> This rule is held especially applicable where the principal's silence might operate to the prejudice of innocent parties.<sup>29</sup>

The presumption of ratification under this rule arises from the duty of the principal to repudiate the unauthorized act. It has been stated that if the principal remains silent when he should speak, he cannot thereafter deny the authority of the agent.<sup>30</sup>

What is a delay for an unreasonable time from which a ratification will be presumed has been held to be a question for the jury, depending upon the peculiar circumstances of each case.<sup>31</sup>

In at least one case stating the rule as above it is held simply that there was sufficient evidence to sustain a finding of ratification by the jury.<sup>32</sup> But in other cases stating the rule as above, the method of determining what is a reasonable time has not been expressly considered, but, so far as appears, the entire question of the existence of a ratification was determined by the court.<sup>33</sup>

Many courts have not gone farther, in defining the time within which a repudiation of the unauthorized act must take place, than to state that the principal must not wait an unreasonable time; other courts have been more specific. It has been held that the repudiation must be made promptly, in the sense that there must be no unnecessary delay.<sup>34</sup> An instruction that the repudiation should be "within a few days," it has been held, should have been changed by substituting "within a reasonable time," or "as soon thereafter as he can."<sup>35</sup> It has been held that a disavowal need not be made "immediately,"<sup>36</sup> or "instantly,"<sup>37</sup> upon acquiring the knowledge. Nor is the failure to do so a circumstance from which the jury could infer a ratification.<sup>38</sup> On the contrary, it has been stated that a principal whose agent has transcended his authority "is bound to disavow it the first moment the fact comes to his knowledge."<sup>39</sup>

What is a reasonable time depends largely upon the facts of the individual case. It seems clear that where there has been an unauthorized purchase of grain, as in one case, and the principal was immediately notified thereof, his duty to repudiate the transaction called for prompter action than in a case in which changes in price or circumstances were not so apt to occur. It has been stated, in a case involving a sale of a carload of flour, that in "commercial transactions of this character a brief time is a reasonable time, in the absence of special circumstances extending it."<sup>40</sup>

Whether mere silence amounts to ratification has been made to depend upon whether the unauthorized act is that of an agent, or of a volunteer or stranger.<sup>41</sup> In the case of an agent an intention to ratify is stated to be presumed from the silence of the principal after being informed of what has been done on his account,<sup>42</sup> especially if there is no repudiation within a reasonable time.<sup>43</sup> It is the duty of the principal to repudiate an unauthorized act of his agent as soon as he is informed thereof, or at least within a reasonable time thereafter. But in the case of a stranger there exists no obligation to repudiate the transaction and mere silence will not be construed into a ratification.<sup>44</sup> At least ratifica-

In Short v. Metz Co. (1915) 165 Ky. 319, 176 S. W. 1144, it is stated that the rule that the act of an authorized agent in excess of his authority is ratified by silence of the principal which induces one to rely, to his prejudice, upon the ratification, does not apply "where the act relied upon is one performed by one who is not an agent, and tion may not be presumed as a conclusion of law from the silence.<sup>45</sup> It has been stated that a failure to disavow the act of a stranger "will not amount to a ratification, unless under such circumstances as indicate an intention" to ratify.<sup>46</sup> Other cases go merely to the extent of holding the presumption of ratification arising from silence to be very much stronger where an agency exists than where a stranger assumes to act.<sup>47</sup>

It is recognized, however, in some cases that silence may amount to ratification even of the act of a stranger. It has been stated in a case involving the act of a stranger that silence is a circumstance which with other circumstances is competent to go to the jury upon the question of ratification.<sup>48</sup> In other cases there is excepted from the operation of the rule, that ordinarily the failure to disavow the act of a stranger will not amount to a ratification, the case in which the circumstances indicate an intention to ratify.<sup>49</sup> Other cases have held that silence may amount to ratification of the act of one who without previous authority assumes to act for another, on the supposition that it may be the duty of the principal in certain circumstances to speak.<sup>50</sup>

It has been stated that for acts to amount to ratification of the act of a stranger there must be prejudice,<sup>51</sup> if by the silence of the purported principal the party dealing with the purported agent is led to take a prejudicial course, that silence may amount to a ratification.<sup>52</sup>

As has previously been stated, prejudice is no necessary element of ratification of the unauthorized act of an agent from mere silence, and this is true also of the act of a stranger. Where there is prejudice, however, there is stronger reason for holding the principal bound to the party dealing with the agent than in the absence of prejudice. And many courts have not carefully analyzed the principles under which the principal may be bound. It has been stated, as in the case of the act of a stranger in the last preceding paragraph, that silence by a principal whose agent has exceeded his authority to the knowledge of the principal amounts to ratification where the party dealing with the agent is misled or prejudiced;<sup>53</sup> a conclusive presumption of ratification is stated to arise where the party dealing with the agent is prejudiced by silence.<sup>54</sup> Other cases state that silent acquiescence may amount to ratification where it is continued for an unreasonable length of time and third persons have acted in reliance upon and been prejudiced by such acquiescence.<sup>55</sup> Other cases have more accurately stated that in such cases the principal is bound by virtue of equitable estoppel.<sup>56</sup> Thus it has been the silence of the one in whose name the act is done does not induce anyone to do anything to his prejudice."

stated that "ratification of the unauthorized acts of an agent by neglecting for an unreasonable length of time after knowledge of them to repudiate them, while the opposite party is acting on them, is an application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel."<sup>57</sup> Again, it has been stated that where the protection of third parties requires it, it will be presumed that a principal who after knowledge of an unauthorized act remains silent has satisfied the act; that such implied ratification "has its foundation in the doctrine of equitable estoppel."<sup>58</sup>

To briefly restate the principles applicable to ratification of the unauthorized act of an agent by silence of the principal, it appears that ratification according to one theory is a question of fact, and may be found to exist from the mere silence of the principal in connection with the circumstances under which it is maintained. According to a considerable number of authorities ratification will be presumed from the failure of the principal to repudiate the unauthorized act within a reasonable time.

Prejudice has been stated to be necessary to a ratification by mere silence. Such a theory, however, rests upon a misconception of the nature of ratification. Prejudice is no necessary element of ratification. But where prejudice to the party dealing with the agent exists, there is more reason for holding the principal bound; the principal is bound, however, in such cases by virtue of an equitable estoppel.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

v.

EASTERN KANSAS OIL COMPANY, Limited, Appt.

Nuisance — refuse from refinery.

1. If the owner of a refinery permits oil, refuse, and poisonous substances in large quantities to escape from the refinery and flow over and upon the land of his neighbor, causing material injury to the neighbor, the use of the refinery will be deemed to be unreasonable and to constitute a "nuisance." For other cases, see Nuisances, I. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — lawful business.

2. The fact that the business of the refinery is in itself a lawful one, and that the owner of it operates it carefully, will not exempt him from liability for casting oil, refuse, and poisonous substances on the land of the plaintiff in such quantities as to cause him substantial injury.

For other cases, see Nuisances, II. d, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — rules governing liability.

3. The liability of the defendant in such a case is measured by the rules in relation to a nuisance, instead of those governing cases of negligence.

For other cases, see Nuisances, II. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(December 8, 1917.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Allen County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused through the operation of defendant's oil refinery. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles H. Apt and Frederick G. Apt, for appellant:

There is no allegation of any negligence or omission on the part of defendant, either in the construction of the refinery or in its operation. Without such averments there is no cause for action stated.

Malchow v. Leoti, 95 Kan. 787, L.R.A. 1915F, 568, 149 Pac. 687; Bailey v. Kelly, 93 Kan. 723, L.R.A.1916D, 1220, 145 Pac. 556; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Y. 118, 19 Am. St. Rep. 475, 25 N. E. 259.

There must be an unnecessary and unwarranted act in the conduct of a lawful business, amounting to negligence, before the owners can be held in damages from carrying on the business.

Mr. Christopher S. Ritter for appellee.

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by S. F. Helms against the Eastern Kansas Oil Company, Limited, to recover damages alleged to have been caused through the operation of defendant's oil refinery, which is situated near the corner of plaintiff's farm, which he has occupied as a homestead for many years. A small natural water course flows through the refinery grounds and across the north half of plaintiff's farm. On May 1, 1914, the plaintiff brought an action against the defendant, claiming damages because of the oil, poisonous substances, and fumes which the defendant had allowed to escape from the refinery and pass over his farm, causing injury to the land and also to some of his cows. The trial of that case resulted in a judgment in defendant's favor as to the injury to the land, but in favor of the plaintiff as to the injury to the cows. That judgment stands as a finality, and the award made against the defendant has been paid and satisfied. On October 1, 1915, the present action was begun, in which the plaintiff averred that during the last two years, and especially since May 1, 1914, the defendant had permitted large quantities of oil, refuse, and poisonous substances to escape from its premises and run upon and over his land, and also that it had contaminated the air with foul and ill-smelling gases and vapors which were carried upon his farm and into his residence. There was an allegation that the defendant had enlarged its plant since May 1, 1914, and that the flow and passage of oil, fumes, and poisons had been correspondingly increased, with the result that his land had been injured to the extent of $1,000, and that, in addition to the damage to the land, his orchard and trees had been injured and the health and comfort of the family impaired, for which he asked $2,000. A motion of defendant to require the plaintiff to separately state and number his causes of action was overruled, the court holding that only a single cause of action had been pleaded. The defendant answered that it was carrying on the refinery business in a lawful and proper way; that the stream that flows through the premises of both is a natural water course; that the use it made of the stream was lawful and proper; and that if any substances had flowed upon plaintiff's land, it was due to excessive rainfall (an act of God); and, further, that the claims made by the plaintiff had either been adjudicated, or were barred by the Statute of Limitations. At a trial on these issues a jury returned a verdict awarding plaintiff $300, and also L.R.A.1918C.

special findings that plaintiff's land was as valuable on October 1, 1915, as it had been on May 1, 1914, and that the trees for the destruction of which plaintiff asked damages had died from improper care and from neglect. On the motion of the defendant the court set aside the special findings and verdict and granted a new trial. The plaintiff then amended his petition, setting forth the creation and maintenance of a nuisance on plaintiff's land by permitting the escape of and the throwing of poisonous substances and vapors over it, for which he asked $3,000. He also alleged special injury to the live stock, which decreased the quantity of milk given by his cows, amounting to $665, and for the destruction of crops and pasture he asked $300. In this petition he alleged that since May 1, 1914, the defendant had increased the equipment of its plant, which increased the injury to his land and other property. The answer which the defendant made to the first petition was refiled as the answer to this petition. The court ruled that this petition stated a single cause of action, and it instructed the jury that the former adjudication constituted a bar to a recovery of any depreciation in or damage to the land which had occurred prior to May 1, 1914, and that only such damages could be recovered as had been caused since that time through the enlargement of the defendant's refinery and increased flow of refuse matter upon the land. The jury was further instructed that the former judgment would not bar a recovery for the alleged loss of crops and pasture and injury to live stock. The second trial of this case resulted in findings that the defendant had not increased the output of its plant since May 1, 1914, and that the land had not decreased in value since that time. There was a finding by the jury that the plaintiff had sustained no loss through the wrongful acts of the defendant, except for injury to the grass on 25 acres of pasture land.

In its appeal defendant complains of the ruling refusing to require the plaintiff to separately state and number his causes of action, insisting that the claim for general damages to the land constituted a distinct cause of action, and that the claim for special damages to other property constituted a different cause of action. Since the jury has specifically found that the land was not injured, and has only awarded damages upon the single item of the loss of the grass, the question is no longer material. Nor is there any good ground for the complaint of a variance between the original and amended petitions.

It is contended that the averments in the plaintiff's amended petition did not warrant a recovery, and therefore defendant's demurrer should have been sustained. This contention is based mainly on the ground that in the petition there was no allegation of any unnecessary act of the defendant in the construction or operation of the refinery, nor any averment that in its operation it was guilty of any negligent act or omission. Defendant insists that the business is a lawful one and that there can be no liability to the plaintiff as a result of the operation of the refinery, in the absence of negligence of the defendant. Plaintiff's action as pleaded must be regarded as one for nuisance rather than negligence. An owner of property, although conducting a lawful business thereon, is subject to reasonable limitations. He must use his property so as not to unreasonably interfere with the health or comfort of his neighbors, or with their right to the enjoyment of their property.

"If he makes an unreasonable or unlawful use of it, so as to produce material injury or great annoyance to his neighbor, he will be guilty of a nuisance to his neighbor, and the law will hold him responsible for the consequent damage." Fogarty v. Junction City Pressed Brick Co. 50 Kan. 478, 487, 18 L.R.A. 756, 31 Pac. 1054.

In Stotler v. Rochelle, 83 Kan. 86, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 49, 109 Pac. 788, the court in defining a "nuisance" said: "It is, of course, not necessary that the use to which property is put shall be unlawful in itself in order to constitute it a nuisance in the eye of the law." 83 Kan. page 88.

Nor will the fact that the business is carried on carefully and in accordance with the ordinary methods employed in such a business relieve one from liability to a neighbor, if the use is unreasonable and such as constitutes a nuisance. In Hauck v. Tidewater Pipe Line Co. 153 Pa. 366, 20 L.R.A. 642, 34 Am. St. Rep. 710, 26 Atl. 644, it was said: "If the mere fact that the business is a lawful business, and has been conducted with care, would be a defense where a neighbor's land had been injured in consequence of the business carried on there, the escape of gas, for instance, or the escape of oil, the result would be that a man might lose his farm; might be compelled to leave it, and have no compensation, simply because the business which brought about this loss was a lawful business and was carried on carefully. That is not the law. No man's property can be taken, directly or indirectly, without compensation, under the law of this state. Hence there are cases, and a great many of them, where a defendant is held liable in damages, although his business is lawful." L.R.A.1918C.

and he has exercised care in carrying it on." 153 Pa. page 375.

Whether or not a use which in itself is lawful is a nuisance depends upon a number of circumstances,—locality and surroundings, the number of people living there, the prior use, whether it is continual or occasional, and the extent of the nuisance and injury caused to the neighbor from the use. If the injury is slight and trivial, and occurs in the development of the natural resources of the land, it is not deemed to be unreasonable. Phillips v. Lawrence Vitriified Brick & Tile Co. 72 Kan. 643, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 92, 82 Pac. 787. The oil that was treated by the defendant at the refinery was obtained elsewhere, and its operations had no connection with the products of the land or the development of its natural resources. Taking the averments of the plaintiff, it is clear that the quantity of oil, refuse, fumes, and gases that were thrown upon plaintiff's land constituted an unreasonable use and a nuisance. However useful and lawful the business in itself is, the defendant cannot be permitted to carry it on in such a way as to cause material injury to the plaintiff. When the injurious substances were thrown upon plaintiff's land in the excessive quantities and in the manner set forth in plaintiff's petition, the defendant's use of its property became both unreasonable and unlawful. In the leading case of Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Exch. 265, it was said: "The person whose grass or corn is eaten down by the escaping cattle of his neighbor, or whose mine is flooded by the water from his neighbor's reservoir, or whose cellar is invaded by the filth of his neighbor's privy, or whose habitation is made unhealthy by the fumes and noisome vapors of his neighbor's alkali works, is damnified without any fault of his own; and it seems but reasonable and just that the neighbor, who has brought something on his own property which was not naturally there, harmless to others so long as it is confined to his own property, but which he knows to be mischievous if it gets on his neighbor's, should be obliged to make good the damage which ensues if he does not succeed in confining it to his own property. But for his act in bringing it there no mischief could have accrued, and it seems but just that he should at his peril keep it there so that no mischief may accrue, or answer for the natural and anticipated consequences. And upon authority, this we think is established to be the law, whether the things so brought be beasts, or water, or filth, or stench." Page 280.

Error assigned in the overruling of the demurrer to plaintiff's evidence is not available, as the evidence is not preserved in the record. The objections to the instructions have been answered in part in what has been said on the contention that a cause of action was not stated in the amended petition, and we find nothing substantial in the other objections to the rulings on the instructions.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Annotation—Oil refinery as a nuisance.

As pertinent to the question under discussion, reference is made to the following notes:

Storage of explosives as a nuisance. Henderson v. Sullivan, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 691; State ex rel. Hopkins v. Excelsior Powder Mfg. Co. L.R.A.1915A, 615.

Storage of oil, gasoline, or gas as nuisance because of explosive or combustible qualities. Whittemore v. Baxter Laundry Co. 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 930.

Liability of one for injury caused by escape of dangerous substance stored on his premises, including escape of oil. Brennan Constr. Co. v. Cumberland, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 535.

The validity of regulations for fire protection other than building regulations. State v. Wittles, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 456.

But few cases in addition to HELMS v. EASTERN KANSAS OIL CO. ante, 227, have been found on the question indicated in the title.

In Com. v. Kidder (1871) 107 Mass. 188, it was conceded that evidence of the carrying on of the business of refining petroleum and other oils so as to emit noisome, offensive, and unwholesome substances, smokes, smells, and stenches which impregnated and rendered the earth and air corrupt, offensive, uncomfortable, and unwholesome, to the great damage and common nuisance of citizens having occasion to use the highways in the vicinity, showed a nuisance at common law. The question presented was whether defendants were protected in their business by two statutes licensing and regulating the keeping, storing, and refining of petroleum and its products. In holding that the defendants were not protected by the statutes against the indictment, the court said: "These enactments are manifestly intended to protect the public against the dangers arising from the explosive and inflammable nature of petroleum; and having regulated the whole subject in that aspect, they might well be deemed to protect any establishment, guarded as they direct, from indictment as a nuisance on account of such dangers only. But they contain no provisions for preventing the spread of unwholesome and offensive odors in the course of the manufacture; and if the defendants' position were sustained the result would be that no limit would be put to such manufacture in the most crowded and populous portions of any town or city. The reasonable, if not the necessary, inference is that it was not the intention of the legislature to establish a new rule in this regard, but to leave the question whether the manufacture is carried on at such places and in such a manner as to be unwholesome and offensive to the public, and on that account indictable as a nuisance, to be determined by the rules of the common law."

So, in Green v. Sun Co. (1907) 32 Pa. Super. Ct. 521, trespass to recover damage for injuries to real estate resulting from fumes from an oil refinery, nuisance was charged and proved. The court observed that "the injury complained of was peculiar and special to the plaintiff. It consisted in the destructive effects and depreciation in value consequent upon the fumes thrown off by the defendant's works. It was something more than the general inconvenience to which the whole community was subjected by reason of the character of the business carried on in the vicinity. So far as appears from the evidence, the defendant's refinery was the only one there which was engaged in refining Texas oil, and we may conclude from the evidence that it was the peculiar quality of this oil which caused the trouble. . . . It is not an answer to the plaintiff's charge to say that the defendant has erected extensive works at large cost and is engaged in the prosecution of a business useful to the public, and that the plaintiff's rights are subordinate to the larger interests of the defendant and the public. The defendant chose to locate its works in proximity to the plaintiff's property and to engage in a business which the jury has declared to be harmful to him. Neither the magnitude nor the importance of its business permits an invasion of the rights of another. . . . If in the advancement of its own interests the defendant has trespassed upon the right of the plaintiff, it cannot justify such conduct by showing that it gives employment to a large number of men and is an important factor in the commerce of the state."

Under an indictment charging that the defendant's refinery constituted a public and common nuisance, because of the emission therefrom of certain noxious and offensive smell and vapors, and because the oils and gases stored and used therein were inflammable, explosive, and dangerous, a verdict of guilty having been rendered, the court in Com. v. Miller (1891) 139 Pa. 77, 23 Am. St. Rep. 170, 27 W. N. C. 257, 21 Atl. 138, 8 Am. Crim. Rep. 619, reversed judgment, on the ground, among others, that the jury was left without an adequate presentation of the defense by an instruction that the character of the location when the refinery was established, the nature and importance of the business, the length of time it had been in operation, the capital invested, and the influence of the business upon the growth and prosperity of the community, were no defense to an indictment for a nuisance. "The right to pure air," observed the court, "is in one sense an absolute one, for all persons have the right to life and health, and such a contamination of the air as is injurious to health cannot be justified; but in another sense it is relative, and depends upon one's surroundings. People who live in great cities that are sustained by manufacturing enterprises must necessarily be subject to many annoyances and positive discomforts by reason of noise, dust, smoke, and odors, more or less disagreeable, produced by and resulting from the business that supports the city. They can only be relieved from them by going into the open country. The defendants had a right to have the character of their business determined in the light of all the surrounding circumstances, including the character of Allegheny as a manufacturing city and the manner of the use of the river front for manufacturing purposes. If, looked at in this way, it is a common nuisance, it should be removed; if not, it may be conducted without subjecting the proprietors to the pecuniary loss which its removal would involve."

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

REBECCA HARVEY

v.

CITY OF BONNER SPRINGS, KANSAS, Appt.

(102 Kan. 9, 169 Pac. 563.)

Pleading — petition for damages.

1. In an action against a city under § 3822 of the Gen. Stat. of 1915, to recover damages in consequence of the action of a mob, the petition is held sufficient to state a cause of action, and the plaintiff's evidence is held sufficient as against a demurrer.

For other cases, see Pleading, II. 1; Trial, II. d, 4, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Appeal — refusal to direct verdict.

2. Upon the facts stated in the opinion, it is held that the court committed no error in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant.

For other cases, see Trial, II. d, 3, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — instructions.

3. In an action against a city to recover damages for the acts of an alleged mob in causing the death of plaintiff's husband, the answer alleged that he had committed a felony by shooting at the city marshal with a revolver; that the city marshal, who was also a deputy sheriff, summoned a posse to aid in arresting him; that he resisted arrest, and was killed while in the act of drawing his revolver; and that the killing was justified. Held that the instructions given correctly stated the law upon the issue raised by the answer.

For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, II. g, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Trial — question for jury — act of mob.

4. In such a case it is held that it was a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the plaintiff's husband had committed a felony, and also whether the crowd of men around plaintiff's house were acting in good faith in attempting to arrest her husband, and shot him in the honest belief that it was necessary to do so, or whether.

as plaintiff claimed, they formed during the time they were assembled a purpose and intent to take his life, and that in carrying out that unlawful purpose he was killed.

For other cases, see Trial, II. c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Mob — sheriff's posse — liability for acts.

5. On the facts stated in the opinion, it is held that the court cannot declare as a matter of law that the persons summoned by the officer in the present case did not constitute a "mob" within the meaning of the statute, since the motive which actuated them, not only when they assembled, but also at the time the death of plaintiff's husband was brought about, became questions of fact; and if on these vital issues reasonable minds might draw different conclusions from the evidence, the verdict in plaintiff's favor cannot be disturbed.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Wyandotte County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful death of her husband. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James F. Getty, for appellant:

The allegations of the amended petition and the plaintiff's evidence fail to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action under the statute.

Cherryvale v. Hawman, 80 Kan. 170, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 645, 133 Am. St. Rep. 195, 101 Pac. 994, 18 Ann. Cas. 149, 21 Am. Neg. Rep. 99; Atchison v. Twine, 9 Kan. 350; Adams v. If Easling was a trespasser in attempting to arrest Harvey, that would not render the assembling of the citizens unlawful, nor their intent to apprehend Harvey an unlawful intent or purpose.

Messrs. J. E. McFadden and H. E. Dean for appellee.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Rebecca Harvey brought this action against the city of Bonner Springs, a city of the third class, to recover damages for the death of her husband. The jury returned a verdict in her favor for $8,500, and judgment was rendered thereon, from which the city appeals.

The action is sought to be maintained under the provisions of § 3822 of the Gen. Stat. of 1915, which provides: "All incorporated cities and towns shall be liable for all damages that may accrue in consequence of the action of mobs within their corporate limits, whether such damages shall be loss of property or injury to life or limb."

The petition alleged: "That on said 18th day of December, 1913, a large number of persons, residents and citizens of the town of Bonner Springs, Kansas, congregated and assembled at and around the home of this plaintiff and her husband, Rolla Harvey, within the corporate limits of said Bonner Springs, and while so assembled, and while the said Rolla Harvey was coming out of his home at their direction and request, said assemblage of persons unlawfully assaulted the said Rolla Harvey with shotguns and revolvers and inflicted upon him mortal wounds which caused his death."

The answer alleged that Rolla Harvey had committed a felony on the night before his death by shooting at the city marshal with a revolver; that Easling, the city marshal, who was also a deputy sheriff, summoned a posse to his aid in attempting to arrest Harvey the next morning; that Harvey resisted the officer and the posse, shot at them, and, on being asked to surrender, refused; that, while he was in the act of drawing his revolver, one of the posse shot him in self-defense; and that the killing was justified.

Rolla Harvey, the plaintiff's husband, at the time of his death was thirty-nine years old. He was a structural steel mechanic in the employ of a bridge company, for which he had been working for six or eight years and held a position as foreman, earning from $4.50 to $6 a day. The family consisted of himself, his wife, and two children, the eldest a boy of less than five years, and a girl less than a year old. For eighteen months Harvey had been a tenant of the city, living in one of two upstairs apartments in the city hall.

The city hall at Bonner Springs is a two-story brick building at the corner of Second and Cedar streets. It is 53 feet long north and south, and 42 feet wide east and west. It fronts south on Second, and its west side abuts on Cedar street, which runs north and uphill. The yard in the rear of the building is above the street, and about on a level with the second story. Extending across the rear of the second story is a porch 5 feet wide, and from the west end of it steps extend down to Cedar street. On the elevated ground in the rear of the building, and facing west, is what is termed in the evidence the "Crow house," the porch of which is about 7 feet wide and 23 feet long, and runs at right angles to the porch on the rear of the upstairs of the city building. The south end of the Crow porch is only 3½ feet from the city hall porch, and practically on a line with the door leading from the hallway out upon the city hall porch. This hallway divides the two apartments upstairs in the city building, on the west side of which lived Rolla Harvey and his family; the east side being occupied by Easling, the city marshal, and his wife. The premises occupied by Rolla Harvey and his family consisted of three rooms. The first room from the north was the kitchen. The next to the south was the living room, and the third was the bedroom. Each of these rooms was connected by a door leading out into the center hall. Each room had a window opening west on Cedar street, and the kitchen had two windows opening north on the porch.

By the special findings the jury found that Harvey had committed no felony as claimed by the city.

The evidence introduced by the plaintiff in reference to what occurred the night before was that about half past 11 o'clock Harvey and a man by the name of Rhodes came down from the Harvey home to the street. Easling, the city marshal, who lived across the hall from Harvey in the same building, followed them downstairs and spoke to them on the street and said, "Ain't you out kind of late to-night?" One of the men replied, "I don't know as it's any of your damn business." To which Easling replied, "I will make it some of my business." The testimony of the witness Adair as to what transpired then was as follows: "And just then somebody busted him, hit him, knocked him out in the street, knocked him 15 or 20 feet, and he raised up and shot the first time through the air, sitting down, and shot up that way. The next time he shot up that way, north, Easling did. I don't know which one busted Easling; the way he rolled, they must have both hit him. Harvey went in the house; Rhodes ran up the hill; Easling ran toward the depot after he fired those two shots. There were no other shots fired then at that time than the ones I mentioned."

The evidence of the plaintiff went to show that when the Harvey family awoke from their sleep the next morning they found their home surrounded by men with pistols and shotguns. Some time after Harvey got up he dressed, went to the kitchen, and washed. He then stepped out on the porch to empty the washbasin. There is a conflict in the evidence as to what then occurred. The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that Harvey was at once met with a volley of shots from revolvers and shotguns fired by men, some of whom were standing under the roof of the porch of the Crow house, others around the corners of buildings, and behind a tree. As a result of this fusillade, one of the posse, Webber, was shot in the fleshy part of the leg. undoubtedly by a shot from Harvey's revolver; Harvey was shot in the left breast by a shotgun fired by one of the posse. Harvey went back into his house, told his wife he had been wounded, and called to his little boy to go for a doctor. Mrs. Harvey was afraid to let the child go, and said that she would summon aid. She went to the window on the west side of the bedroom, for the purpose of calling to outsiders, and as she raised the blind she was confronted with a shotgun in the hands of another of the posse, O'Donnell, who had been stationed across the street. She screamed and got back from the window, and started to cross the hall for the purpose of using the telephone in the Easling apartments. When she reached the hall, she was ordered back by Milstead, who pointed a shotgun towards her, and she retreated into one of the rooms. Milstead was standing at this time only a few yards from her on the porch of the Crow house, directly in line with the hallway.

An interval of about fifteen minutes occurred between the first and the second shooting. During this lull in the hostilities, and while the Harvey family were in their rooms, Easling, the city marshal, who had summoned the posse, said, "Well, I will just shoot in the window once and see if I can raise him." He then fired with a shotgun through the screen in the west window. When this shot was fired Mrs. Harvey came out into the hall again, and Milstead asked, "Will he come out? Will he surrender?" She said, "Well, I will see." She went in and told her husband that they wanted to know if he would surrender, and Harvey said, "Yes, tell them to come on in." She then went out in the hall and told Milstead what her husband had said, and Milstead replied, "We will never come in there; tell him to come out." Mrs. Harvey then went back to her husband and told him they said for him to come out, they would not come in, and he got up and went out. She went with him. She testified that when Harvey went out she went out the kitchen door with him. She had the children with her, the baby in her arms, and the little boy by her side. Harvey was a little in advance of her on the porch. She stood in the doorway of the hall, when someone said, "Go back in there; put them children back in there." "Get the children out the way." "Get in there." That they all had their guns in their hands, and she put the little boy back and stepped back herself; and just as she stepped back, and as her husband started to raise his arms, they fired, and he staggered up against the door casing, turned, walked back into the kitchen, and fell over on his face, dead. "He did not have any gun in his hands or weapon in his clothes at that time."

Timmons, a farmer living near Bonner Springs, a friend of Harvey in his lifetime, was a witness for plaintiff. He was on the street near the city hall just before the second shooting occurred. He observed the parties had guns, and he talked with O'Donnell, who was standing across the street from the city hall, armed with a shotgun. When Timmons learned who it was they were trying to arrest, or wanted, he said to O'Donnell, "I will get Rolla for you," but O'Donnell replied, "No, Timmons, we are going to get him." The witness said, "All right, if you want to get into trouble, go ahead," and turned around and went away and left him.

Mr. Longfellow, who was mayor of the city, and who had been sheriff of the county for two terms, was a witness for the defense. His testimony is that the night before, when Marshal Easling consulted with him with reference to the trouble with Harvey, he advised him to get some guards to guard the house until after daylight. "And I told him that I believed, when the whisky died out on him, he would surrender without any trouble. They left my house and went away." He further testified that, a little after 7 o'clock the next morning, he was present at the first exchange of shots between the besiegers and Harvey. There were five persons in the crowd besides himself at that time. He described the position of the men surrounding the house. Easling, O'Donnell, and Lawrence were at the corner of the house, and Webber about opposite the center of the porch. Milstead, it appears, was behind a tree in the yard. During the shooting, the witness heard Webber say, "I am shot," and Webber then took his shotgun, aimed in the direction where Harvey stood, and fired. After the first shooting, the mayor left and went back to his work.

O'Donnell was a witness for the defense. About 1 o'clock the night before the shooting, he heard Easling direct Weber to stay at the back of the building and guard it. Easling directed the witness to go and get a revolver. Webber made some reference to having a shotgun, and Easling told him to get it. Easling gave orders that they were all to be at the city hall at daylight. The witness arrived at the scene with Mayor Longfellow and Milstead. When he arrived there were present, besides himself, Milstead, and the mayor, Easling, Webber, and Norvall Lawrence. "Harvey was just in the act of coming out of the door, pushing the screen open, when I first saw him. The porch is 5 feet wide, according to the plat. . . . I should say he took at least two steps from the door, a little left of what would be straight forward. I observed him with a wash pan in his hand. . . . My impression was, and is yet, that at first he had both hands on the pan or near the pan. Then Marshal Easling commanded him to surrender. He told him to consider himself under arrest, that he was under arrest, and to throw up his hands; and began immediately to advance over the end of the Crow porch toward Mr. Harvey. . . . When he said that, Harvey began to back into the door; he went back quickly. . . . Easling fired. I saw Harvey in the act of shooting. I heard two reports and saw the flashes from both Easling and Mr. Harvey. My impression is that Mr. Easling's gun was fired first; always has been my testimony all the way through, and is yet. . . . After those two shots, the other persons out there were firing. I saw old man Webber fire. He had a shotgun. I heard Webber say he was hit. Then I saw him fire. . . . Quite soon after he (Easling) fired twice out of his revolver, he asked me for this revolver. He said, 'Give it to me.' After I gave him the revolver, he shot Mr. Harvey with it, or shot in that direction. I couldn't tell how many times. . . . There was a good deal of shooting there in the instant, or minute, or a short time. Those that I saw were all pointed at Rolla Harvey as he stood there in the hallway; they were all pointed in that direction. That is the reason I said in my direct examination, 'I expected to see him fall dead in his tracks at any time.' You could not understand why he wasn't killed. They were all shooting at him; that is, in that direction."

After Harvey went into the house the witness went and got a shotgun, and, at the direction of Easling, took a position in the street, to prevent Harvey from escaping from that side of the house.

This witness also testified: "I heard Easling say, immediately after Milstead fired that last shot, 'Give him the other barrel.'"

In regard to what occurred at the second shooting, Mr. Milstead, the man who fired the fatal shot, testified: "After Harvey went back into the house, I went from there to my rooms and got a shotgun. I went to go and get a shotgun because Easling told me to go and get a gun, if I ain't mistaken. . . . When I pulled up my gun and shot at him, he stood right there in the hallway. I aimed right at him. . . . When I shot he staggered back and turned into the room out of my sight. My shot was the only shot that was fired at that time. When I fired that shot, Easling was standing right near me. . . . I don't remember whether Easling said, 'Give him the other barrel,' or not. I wouldn't say positive whether he told me to shoot again or not. I don't recall it if I said, 'No, that got him.' I don't recall it if I said it; I would not say that I did not say it. During the lull, I heard Mr. Easling say, 'Well, I will just shoot in the window once and see if I can raise him.' He did shoot; I couldn't say whether he shot into the window or not. I seen the shot up in the kitchen window after that. Q. Was there anybody there, either Mr. Harvey or his wife, or those two little babies, in sight of you at the time that shot was fired by Easling into the window? A. They were not."

Referring to what occurred at the time Harvey was killed, he testified: "I couldn't say how long it was after Easling fired that shot before Mrs. Harvey appeared in the hall. . . . I told her to take those children back and go back into the house, or some words to that effect. She did that immediately. She was right at her kitchen door and stepped right back into the kitchen. I did not shoot right at that moment. Harvey was standing right there where I could see him. The next thing that occurred was that I asked him to come out and surrender, once or twice. I don't know whether he heard me or not. He made no reply. I think I said, 'Throw up your hands.' I didn't see him if he started to throw up his hands. I never seen his hand, if it was up there so as to protect his body from shot. I think his hands were down at his side. I would not swear positively that they were hanging clear down. I am not positive sure where they were; I don't think they were on his breast, either of them."

On his direct examination the witness Milstead testified that when he asked Harvey to come out and surrender, "he kind of stepped back this way, dropped his hand like he was going into his pocket. I fired the shotgun. I shot at him at that time because I thought my life was in danger. He had been shooting there, and I didn't know but what he would shoot again."

On cross-examination he was asked whether or not he had testified at the coroner's inquest that his instructions were to take Harvey dead or alive, and whether he had not answered, "The marshal told me that if he can't,—if he didn't surrender, to shoot him." His answer was: "Easling told me that, I believe, yes; yes, I will say yes, 'if he didn't surrender.' I couldn't say that he also told me to shoot him regardless of whether he resisted or not; I couldn't say that he did. I wouldn't say that he didn't. It has been so long ago." He had known Harvey probably twenty years. "During that twenty years I had not personally any knowledge of his ever having shot anybody, or committed any felony, or stolen anybody's property, or been a violent, turbulent man."

Webber, who testified for the defense, said that Easling deputized him to guard the house at the rear, and told him what had happened. From 1 o'clock in the night until daylight he stood guard alone, except for a short time when O'Donnell and the marshal were there. In reference to his instructions, he said, "I kind of think he (Easling) told me to shoot if he (Harvey) didn't surrender."

Easling was dead when the trial took place, more than two years after these occurrences. The city offered evidence to show that Harvey bore a reputation of being a turbulent, violent, and dangerous man; that in 1901 he had been convicted of larceny in Wyoming and served a term of two years in the penitentiary there.

The plaintiff introduced witnesses in rebuttal as to the character and reputation of Harvey in the neighborhood where he had resided.

There was a justice of the peace in Bonner Springs, but no warrant had been issued for the arrest of Harvey.

The jury made the following special findings:

"1. What persons were about the outside of the city hall in Bonner Springs on the night of December 17, 1913, or in the morning of December 18, 1913, before the death of Harvey? Webber, Easling, Lawrence, Milstead, O'Donnell.

"2. Did such persons leave their homes and assemble at the city hall upon the call, order, or direction of anyone? Yes.

"3. If you answer the last question in the affirmative, upon whose call or order did they assemble there? Easling.

"4. At the time in question, was William G. Easling an appointed, qualified, and acting deputy sheriff of Wyandotte county, Kansas? Yes.

"5. For what purpose were said persons called or ordered to assemble at said city hall? To arrest Rolla Harvey.

"6. Did said Harvey on the night of December 17, 1913, while in the company of one Rhodes, on Cedar street, in the city of Bonner Springs, assault William G. Easling by shooting at him? No.

"7. Was said Harvey armed with a revolver when he first came out upon the porch of the city hall on the morning of December 18, 1913? We think he was.

"8. Did said Harvey on the morning of December 18, 1913, when informed that he was under arrest, or was called upon by the marshal to surrender and throw up his hands, comply with such request? The first time he did not, but the last time he did.

"9. Did said Harvey, upon being informed that he was under arrest or throw up his hands by said William G. Easling, hold in his hand or produce a revolver and shoot with the same at said W. G. Easling or the persons with him at the time? The first time we think he did, but the last time he did not.

"10. Did said Harvey shoot at or inflict a wound upon one Webber at said time? We think the bullet that struck Mr. Webber possibly was fired by Harvey."

The contention of defendant that it was error to overrule a demurrer to the evidence is argued upon two grounds. First, that the petition fails to state a cause of action under the statute which imposes upon cities and towns a liability for injuries occasioned by the acts of a mob. There was no demurrer to the petition; besides, it stated a cause of action under the statute when it alleged that a large number of persons congregated and assembled at and around the house of the plaintiff and her husband within the limits of the city; that, while her husband was coming out of his house at their direction and request, the assemblage of persons unlawfully assaulted him with shotguns and revolvers and caused his death. The second ground upon which it is urged the demurrer was well taken is that there was no evidence to sustain such a cause of action when plaintiff rested her case. If the petition stated a cause of action under the statute, the evidence was sufficient as against a demurrer, because it tended to prove just what the plaintiff alleged in her petition.

The main contention is that the court erred in not directing a verdict for the defendant. The defendant invokes the well-known rule that where an officer has legal authority to make an arrest, and is using proper means, he may repel force with force, and if the person resisting is necessarily killed in the struggle the homicide is justified, and a corollary to the same rule, to the effect that "duly summoned assistants of an officer are under the same protection of the law that is afforded to the officer who has process in his hands." Many authorities are cited in the brief, holding that where an officer making an arrest for a felony is forcibly resisted he is not limited to such force as is necessary to protect himself from death or great bodily harm, but may stand his ground and use such force as is necessary, or apparently necessary, to overcome the resistance offered, even to the extent of taking life.

Other authorities relied upon state the rule as to the power and the rights of an officer in arresting a person who is committing a public offense in his presence, or where a felony has been committed and the officer has in his possession a warrant for the arrest. The officer in the present case had no warrant, and the jury has found that no felony was committed. There was some conflict in the evidence; but in our opinion there was abundant evidence,—perhaps a preponderance—to sustain the finding in favor of the plaintiff that all that Harvey was guilty of the night before his death was assaulting the city marshal and knocking him down, and that the only revolver shots on that occasion were fired by the officer himself.

We think it was a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the crowd of men around Harvey's house that morning were acting in good faith in attempting to make his arrest, and killed him in the honest belief that it was necessary to kill or disable him; or, on the other hand, as the plaintiff claimed, they formed, during the time of the assemblage, the purpose and intent to take his life, and that in carrying out that purpose he was killed. The court stated the law fairly on these propositions and gave admirable instructions. The jury were told that the burden of proof rested upon the plaintiff to establish that her husband met his death at the hands of a mob; and unless the jury believed from the preponderance of the evidence that her husband was so killed, no recovery could be had against the defendant; and that if the jury believed from a preponderance of all the evidence that the assemblage about his home was without authority of law, but for the purpose and with the intent on their part of doing violence to or injuring plaintiff's husband, or that, after having assembled for the purpose, whether lawful or otherwise, they thereafter formed the unlawful purpose of injuring the said Rolla Harvey, and, while so assembled, they did, or any of them did, inflict injury upon him from which his death resulted, they should find for the plaintiff.

The court charged that the fact that a member or members of a lawfully assembled posse in attempting to effect an arrest might act too hastily, or unnecessarily kill a person sought to be arrested within the limits of the city, would not render the city liable for the death; in order that a liability may arise, the posse, after having lawfully assembled, must have abandoned and lost its character as such, and must have become a mob. They were charged that if they found from the evidence that Easling was a deputy sheriff, or city marshal, and that Harvey attempted to shoot him without other provocation than being accosted in the nighttime with an inquiry as to his presence on the street at that time of night, or words to that effect, Harvey was guilty of a felony, and that Easling had the right to arrest him without a warrant, and to call on any citizen or citizens of the county to assist him in making such arrest; and that it was the duty of any citizen or citizens to obey the call and to act under the orders and directions of Easling; and that while so acting they were clothed with the same duties, responsibilities, and protection as Easling, and the defendant would not be liable for their acts. The court also charged that in the face of a resistance an officer attempting to arrest one who has committed a felony is not required to fall back, but, on the contrary, is justified and encouraged to press forward and vindicate the law by effecting the arrest or apprehension of the person. In another instruction the jury were told that if they believed from the evidence that the persons present at the time Harvey was killed were there in pursuance of the call of a deputy sheriff for assistance, the presence of citizens so assembled would not constitute a "mob" as defined by the statute, and that the defendant would not be liable for the acts of such citizens in attempting to arrest or apprehend Harvey, "even though you should find that the acts of said citizens or any of them were not excusable on the ground of self-defense, or apparent necessity, as hereinbefore explained, and your verdict should be for the defendant, unless you find that, after having lawfully assembled, an unlawful intent and purpose was formed, and a mob constituted as hereinbefore defined."

These instructions state the law contended for by the defendant with respect to the rights of an officer making an arrest without process where a felony has been committed, and the protection afforded by the law to those whom such officer has called to his assistance. As already observed, the jury find that no felony had been committed by Rolla Harvey. They may have believed that he was guilty of a misdemeanor or the violation of a city ordinance. Under the instructions of the court, and facts which the jury believe were shown by a preponderance of the evidence, they may have found that the assemblage was lawful at first, and that afterwards those assembled united in an unlawful purpose to injure or take the life of Harvey unless he surrendered. If these facts were true, no member of the assemblage could invoke the rule that he was protected by reason of the lawful purpose for which the assemblage was first formed; nor could the city rely for a defense upon the fact that the assemblage in its original purpose was lawful.

The statute defines a "mob" as "any collection of individuals assembled for an unlawful purpose, intending to injure any person by violence and without authority of law" (Gen. Stat. 1915, § 3727); and the statute which provides for the punishment of persons participating in unlawful assemblages (Gen. Stat. 1915, § 3674) defines an "unlawful assemblage" as "three or more persons" who "assemble together with intent to do any unlawful act with force and violence against the person or property of another, or to do any unlawful act against the peace."

In the quite recent case of Blakeman v. Wichita, 93 Kan. 444, L.R.A.1915C, 578, 144 Pac. 816, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 188, it was held that under these statutes it is immaterial what the primary purpose was for which the persons assembled "if they in fact formed and executed the unlawful purpose after they were together." Syl. 2. In that case the city was held liable for the acts of a mob, comprised wholly of persons confined in the city prison, who unlawfully assembled and acted together in assaulting a fellow prisoner in the jail. The opinion quotes from Madisonville v. Bishop, 113 Ky. 106, 57 L.R.A. 130, 67 S. W. 269, the following language: "The purpose of the assembly, or the aim that it had primarily in view, is not material, if it was in fact riotous or tumultuous, and the city authorities had notice of it and ability to prevent the damage it did." 93 Kan. 448.

The courts have always been jealous, and rightly so, of any attempt to limit unduly the exercise in good faith of the power and rights the law has conferred upon an officer of the peace in the discharge of his duties; but peace officers, like all other officers, are subject to human frailties and passions: so long as they act with proper motives in seeking to arrest a person charged with an offense the law protects them and those summoned to assist, even though, acting hastily, or upon mistaken judgment, they unnecessarily take the life of the person charged. The fact, however, that the assemblage acts under the color of authority as a posse summoned by an officer will not necessarily and of itself furnish a defense to the city in an action under the statute.

of law that the assemblage in the present case was not a mob within the meaning of the statute, because the motive which actuated the assemblage, not only at the time it was assembled, but also until the death of plaintiff's husband was brought about, was a question of fact; and if on this vital issue reasonable minds might draw different conclusions from the evidence, we are bound by the verdict of the jury. It certainly cannot be said that the statute affords no redress in a situation which conceivably might happen, where a deputy sheriff or city marshal, or an assistant city marshal called together a posse to assist him in making an arrest for a misdemeanor, intending under the guise of such a call to take, and did take, the life of the person charged, on the pretense that he was resisting arrest, or that they or some of them were in danger of being assaulted by him. In some of the large cities of our own country men have been known to conspire with officers to bring about the death of a person whom they desire to get rid of, and, in carrying out such unlawful purpose, to employ the pretense that the person was killed while resisting an arrest. In the bandit wars in Mexico,—and if some of the stories which are told of the present world war are true, it sometimes happens in other countries,—prisoners of war have been shot under the specious pretense that they were attempting to escape.

There is some complaint in reference to the rejection of testimony. The court properly limited the cross-examination of plaintiff to matters connected with her testimony in chief. Some of the testimony rejected was hearsay. Besides, none of the evidence concerning which complaint is made was brought to the court's attention on the hearing of the motion for a new trial. The instructions given, as already observed, presented fairly the issues raised by the defense.

Because of plaintiff's neglect to present a verified claim against the city, it is conceded that she was not entitled to judgment for costs. She should have offered in the lower court to release the judgment for costs before the appeal was taken, and we think it is proper that one half the costs in this court should be taxed to plaintiff.

The judgment, except as to costs in the court below, is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied January 18, 1918.

Annotation—What is a mob or riot for the act of which a municipality is liable.

This question has been previously discussed in notes to Adamson v. New York, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 925, and Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Chicago, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 359. The cases in the present note are supplementary thereto.

Generally, as to liability of municipal corporations for failure to prevent improper conduct in or use of streets, see notes to Van Cleef v. Chicago, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 636, especially cases under heading, "Riots and unlawful assemblages;" and Goodwin v. Reidsville, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 862.

A large number of persons confined together in a city jail, who joined together to whip another prisoner, and who did severely whip and injure him, were, in Blakeman v. Wichita (1914) 93 Kan. 444, L.R.A.1915C, 578, 144 Pac. 816, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 188, held to be a "mob" or "riotous assemblage" within the meaning of the statute making cities liable for damages resulting from mob violence. And the fact that these persons did not voluntarily come into the jail does not prevent their action from being that of a mob, nor is it the primary purpose for which they assembled material, if they in fact formed and executed the unlawful purpose after they were brought together. See also HARVEY v. BONNER SPRINGS, ante, 231.

In Cherryvale v. Hawman (1909) 80 Kan. 170, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 645, 133 Am. St. Rep. 195, 101 Pac. 994, 18 Ann. Cas. 149, 21 Am. Neg. Rep. 99, an action upon a statute making cities liable for injuries done by mob, an instruction that "a mob is an unorganized assemblage of many persons intent on unlawful violence, either to persons or property," is held not erroneous because it makes no reference to a determination on the part of those composing the assemblage to resist opposition. So in this case it is held that where the members of a charivari party forcibly place a bride and groom in a wagon against their will, and draw them up and down the streets, they are engaged in an act of unlawful violence within the meaning of such definition. The fact that they are good-natured and intend no serious harm to anyone does not absolve the corporation from liability.

In Stevens v. Sheriff (1905) 71 Kan. 434, 80 Pac. 936, an action for damages on account of injuries to the person and property of the plaintiff, alleged in the L.R.A.1918C.

petition to have been unlawfully inflicted by several persons while "acting in concert and as a mob, and in pursuance and furtherance of a common design," it is held error to instruct that a recovery can be had only upon proof that the defendants constituted a mob; that, assuming it to be necessary in such a case for the plaintiff to prove that the defendants constituted a mob, it is error to instruct that "a mob is the assemblage of a number of people acting in a tumultuous and riotous manner, calculated to put good citizens to fear, and to endanger their persons and property."

In a case somewhat similar to HARVEY v. BONNER SPRINGS, a collection of persons, some of whom had been deputized to capture a negro who, having violated the law, had taken refuge in a house, was, in Arnold v. Centralia (1915) 197 Ill. App. 73, an action against a city for damages to property by shooting, held to be a mob, under a statute defining a mob to be "any collection of individuals, five or more in number, assembled for the unlawful purpose of offering violence to the person or property of anyone supposed to have been guilty of a violation of the law, or for the purpose of exercising correctional powers over any person or persons by violence, and without lawful authority."

In People v. Most (1891) 128 N. Y. 108, 26 Am. St. Rep. 458, 27 N. E. 970, an anarchist was indicted under statute requiring that, in order to constitute the offense of unlawful assembly, three or more persons, being assembled, should attempt or threaten any act "tending towards a breach of the peace, or an injury to person or property, or any unlawful act." "The offense," observes the court, "can only be committed when there is a concert or combination of three or more persons who unite in the attempt or in the threat to do one or more of the things specified in the statute. A threat made by one or by two persons only, in which no others participated, would not be indictable under this statute, although made in an assembly of many persons. It was also the rule of the common law that three or more persons should be assembled and participate in the unlawful purpose in order to constitute the offense of unlawful assembly, or the cognate offenses of rout and riot. 4 Bl. Com. 146; 1 Russell, Crimes, 288. Unless, therefore, the jury were authorized to find that the threat charged in the indictment was made not only by the defendant, Most, but also by at least two other persons on the occasion in question, the offense was not made out."

It is stated in Mitchell v. Champaign County (1899) 10 Ohio C. D. 801, 9 Ohio

S. & C. P. Dec. 821, involving a lynching, that an essential element to change a collection of individuals into a "mob" is the intent to do damage or injury to someone, or the pretense to exercise correctional power over other persons by violence, and without authority of law.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

E. B. MILLER et al., Appts.,
v.
CENTRAL CITY.

Intoxicating liquor — adoption of prohibition — refund of license fee.

A city is not compelled to refund the unearned portion of the fee exacted for a license to sell liquor, because, upon its being voted dry, the county officials force the holder of the license to close his business, if the city authorities make no attempt to interfere with the business.

For other cases, see Assumpsit, II. c, 2, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(January 11, 1918.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Muhlenberg County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the unearned portion of the fee exacted for a liquor license. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Freeman & Straud for appellants.

Mr. Walker Wilkins for appellee.

Sampson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Miller and May for many years were engaged in the saloon business in Central City. On September 28, 1912, a local option election was held whereby that territory became dry. Their licenses, however, for that year, did not expire until December, at which time they applied for and took out a new license for another twelve months; and again, on the expiration of the second license, they applied for and took out, in December, 1913, a license good until December 5, 1914. In the meantime the local option election had been contested by the wets, and tried out before the board of election commissioners, who upheld the election.

Note. — As to right to recover liquor license fee or unearned portion thereof upon adoption of legislation or regulation inimical to the sale of intoxicating liquor, see annotation following this case, post, 241.

It was then appealed to the circuit court, which affirmed the finding of the election commissioners, and from the circuit court it was appealed to this court; a supersedeas having been executed staying the proceedings of the county court upon the election. The local option election was held valid by this court, and mandate issued April 25, 1914. On April 27th a certificate of election was issued by the canvassing board, and this certificate, with proper orders adjudging valid said election, was spread of record on the order books of the Muhlenberg county court. The county attorney and judge of the quarterly court were endeavoring by prosecutions to stop the sale of intoxicating liquors in Central City, and had issued a number of warrants against appellants and other saloon keepers charging them with the unlawful sale of whisky in that city. Some trials were had on these warrants, and a conviction resulted in each case, but neither of the appellants had been tried. On May 1, 1914, appellants, along with other saloon keepers, agreed with the county attorney to and did close up their saloons and ceased to operate the same. At that time appellants held a saloon license granted them by the city authorities, authorizing them to operate a saloon for the year ending December 5, 1914. The city authorities did not interfere with appellants in the operation of their saloons, nor did they ask or require them to close their business. It was only the county authorities who attempted this. However, on July 7, 1914, the city council of Central City passed an ordinance prohibiting the sale of intoxicants by persons without a license within the municipal corporation, but the saloons had all been closed long before that by agreement with the county attorney.

This action was instituted by Miller and May, holders of a saloon license, to recover of the city pro tanto for the 202 days which they allege they were prohibited from operating their saloon before the expiration of said license on December 5, 1914.

Can a keeper of a saloon who has obtained from a municipality, in consideration of $1,000 per year, a license to carry on his business, have of the city a pro tanto recovery of the $1,000 license tax, if he,

to avoid a multiplicity of criminal prosecutions, agree with officials other than those of the city to and does close his saloon 202 days before the expiration of the life of the license? This is the real question in this case, and the one this action was intended to determine. We must answer it in the negative.

The city and its officials did not attempt to close appellants' saloon, or to prevent them from selling liquor under the license which appellants held. The county authorities, however, did issue warrants against appellants and caused their arrest, but these officials acted upon their own initiative and entirely without encouragement or authority from the municipal officials. The saloon men had the undoubted right to continue the sale of liquor until the expiration of their license, and this question had been well settled by this court, and appellants should not have voluntarily relinquished their right to conduct a saloon, especially when the courts had determined the question in their favor. Whether appellants would be entitled to a recovery had the city officials themselves prevented the operation of the saloon it is unnecessary here to decide.

Appellants contend that they involuntarily relinquished their right to carry on the saloon business, and that an analogy between an involuntary relinquishment, such as this, and an involuntary payment of a license tax wrongfully assessed, exists. It is well settled that, where a licensee, under protest, pays a tax to prevent the immediate seizure of his person or property, or to obtain his release after his arrest, such payment will be considered involuntary, and its recovery will be permitted. But there is no analogy between the case at bar and those cited by appellants supporting the principle just stated. In this case the saloon keepers were being prosecuted by county officers, and to avoid these criminal prosecutions appellants, by agreement with the county attorney, relinquished their right to continue in the saloon business. With this Central City and its officials had nothing to do and were in no manner responsible. The law upon the subject of sales by licensees after the territory is voted dry and before the expiration of the license was well settled by this court, and the legal profession in this commonwealth was fully acquainted therewith. While it is alleged by plaintiffs below that they could not get attorneys to definitely advise them as to their right to sell liquor after the entry of the certificate of election, it cannot be doubted that many lawyers in Muhlenberg county and elsewhere in Kentucky were well acquainted with the law as announced in the cases of Watts v. Com. 78 Ky. 329, and Shehan v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 125 Ky. 478, 101 S. W. 380. Moreover, in the case of May v. Com. 160 Ky. 785, 170 S. W. 493, to which one of the appellants was a party, the doctrine of the case of Watts v. Com. supra, was reaffirmed, and it was made quite plain that the licensee had the right to continue the sale of intoxicants during the period for which he had a license. This opinion was rendered and published subsequent to the filing and entry of the election certificate, but previous to the expiration of the license held by appellants.

Appellants' petition contains almost three pages of irrelevant and redundant matter which the lower court upon motion properly struck out. Leave was then given to amend the petition, but the petitioners declined to plead further. Thereupon the circuit court sustained a demurrer to the petition and dismissed the action. There can be no serious controversy as to the correctness of the ruling of the circuit court in sustaining the motion to strike, nor can it be urged that the allegations which remained in the petition were sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This being true, the Circuit Court properly sustained the demurrer and dismissed the action.

Judgment affirmed.

Annotation—Right to recover liquor license fee or unearned portion thereof upon adoption of legislation or regulation inimical to the sale of intoxicating liquor.

The recovery of an unearned liquor license fee where the business has not been entered upon, or has been abandoned voluntarily, or where the license turns out to have been improperly issued, is discussed in the note to Allsman v. Oklahoma City (1908) 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 512. And see the subsequent case of Scott v. New Castle (1909) 132 Ky. 616, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 112, 116 S. W. 788, L.R.A.1918C.

holding that one who secures and pays for a license to sell intoxicating liquor under an interpretation of the law by a nisi prius court may, upon reversal of the decision by a ruling that there was no authority to issue the license, recover an amount of the money so paid in proportion to the remainder of the term.

The right or duty of municipal corporations to refund liquor license fees on adoption of state prohibition is discussed in the note to Fitzgerald v. Witchard, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 519.

The recovery of an unearned liquor license fee upon revocation of the license for misconduct of the licensee is discussed in the note to Roberts v. Boise City, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 593.

As to the right of the legal representative of a deceased licensee to recover a portion of the fee paid for a liquor license, because of the licensee's death before the expiration of the term of the license, see the note to Wood v. School Dist. 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 478.

As to the liability for damages for wrongful revocation of liquor license, see Claussen v. Luverne, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 698, and note.

As to the constitutionality of a statute by which conviction of violation of the liquor law entailed revocation of the license and prohibition of the sale of liquor, see the note to State v. Woodward, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1004.

It has been stated that the legislature has power to enact a local option statute under which a license to sell liquors may be annulled, without making any provision for the refunding of license money paid. Brooks, J., in Ex parte Vaccarezza (1907) 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 105, 105 S. W. 1119. In discussing the validity of a statute which made provision for the refunding of the unearned portion of license money, the court, in Gillesby v. Canyon County (1910) 17 Idaho, 586, 107 Pac. 71, states that a "license for the sale of intoxicating liquor is not a contract between the state and the licensee, but is merely a permission, and is subject at all times to the control of the state, and in exercising the police power the legislature may pass an act which in effect revokes and annuls a license issued prior to the passage of such act, and the legislature possesses such power without making any provision whatever for the refunding of license money paid." Accordingly, the act was held constitutional in an action brought to test the constitutionality thereof. Ibid.

Some statutes in providing for local option make provision for the refunding of the unearned portion of license fees. This is true of the statute involved in People v. McBride (1908) 234 Ill. 146, 123 Am. St. Rep. 82, 84 N. E. 865, 14 Ann. Cas. 994; State ex rel. Bucy v. Troy (1912) 177 Ind. 413, 98 N. E. 290 (holding that the license must be valid, however, to entitle the holder to a refund under such a statute); Hall v. Smith-McKenney Co. (1915) 162 Ky. L.R.A. 1918C.

Such statutes providing for a refund have been upheld. Calderwood v. Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co. (1909) 107 Minn. 465, 121 N. W. 221, sustaining the validity of a curative act enacted to validate the refunding of unearned license fees by a municipality. It is by some statutes expressly made a condition of the rebate that no arrest or indictment for violation of the liquor law be pending against the holder upon the surrender; a holder who is under arrest at the time of such surrender is not entitled to the rebate, nor can an assignee of such holder recover. People ex rel. Frank Brewery v. Cullinan (1901) 168 N. Y. 258, 61 N. E. 243; People ex rel. Seitz v. Lyman (1901) 59 App. Div. 172, 69 N. Y. Supp. 111. Cases passing upon statutes which expressly regulate the refunding of the unearned fee have not in general been considered in this note.

It is a view maintained by some courts where the sale is prohibited by virtue of action taken under a local option statute, that one who takes out a license while a law authorizing such action is in effect cannot recover the unearned portion thereof. Thus, it has been held that one who took out a license for the sale of intoxicating liquor within a certain distance of a church, when there was in existence a law authorizing the county court upon proper petitions to prohibit such sale, could not, after such sale had been prohibited under the law, recover the unearned portion of his license tax. Peyton v. Hot Springs Co. (1890) 53 Ark. 236, 13 S. W. 764. This is held irrespectively of whether the judgment of the court prohibiting the sale of liquor annulled and revoked the license. The court states that the payment of the license was legal when made by the appellant, and was voluntary on his part; that if the effect of the judgment of the court prohibiting the sale within a stated distance of the church did not annul and revoke his license, he was not injured, and could not recover the amount paid therefor; and that if his license was annulled and revoked by said judgment, there was no authority in the statute for apportioning the amount of the license tax according to the time that appellant sold under the license. Upon the petition for prohibition being granted, the holder of the license abandoned the sale of liquor under it, made application by petition to the county court to recover the sum paid by him for his license. A statutory provision that licenses may be obtained to sell liquors for a period less than a year, but the licensee must pay the license tax for a full year, lends some support to the theory adopted by the court.

It was held in the subsequent case of Alexander v. State (1905) 77 Ark. 294, 91 S. W. 181, where an order prohibiting the sale of liquor within a stated distance of a schoolhouse was revoked by the county court, but the revoking order was reversed upon appeal to another court, that one who had in the meantime obtained a license to sell liquor could not recover the unearned portion thereof; but it is expressly held that the judgment of the appellate court operated as a revocation of the license issued to the appellant. Where the issuing of a license is subject to an appeal, and an appeal is taken and the order issuing it reversed, that the holder is not entitled to recover the unearned portion is held also in Monroe County v. Kreuger (1882) 88 Ind. 231.

It is held in Bender v. Fergus Falls (1911) 115 Minn. 66, 131 N. W. 849, that, without statutory authority, no refund of the unearned portion of the liquor license can properly be made where the sale has been rendered unlawful by virtue of a local option election. Under statutory authority providing that a liquor license shall be annulled by the sale of liquor becoming unlawful in the place for which such license is granted, and providing that in such case such part of the license fee as corresponds to the time such license has yet to run "may be returned," it is held that a municipality which has voted to prohibit the sale of liquor under a local option statute may return the unearned portion of the license fee, but that it is not compelled to do so, as the statute is discretionary only, and not mandatory. Accordingly, a licensee whose rights have been annulled is held not entitled to recover a balance on an unearned portion above that which the municipality has voluntarily returned to him.

In Fitzgerald v. Witchard (1908) 130 Ga. 552, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 519, 61 S. E. 227, municipal authorities were enjoined from refunding the unearned portion of a license fee to the holder of a license granted by the city, who voluntarily discontinued business before the expiration thereof because of a state law exacting a higher license fee, where the attempt to refund was made by city officials who succeeded others who had failed to act upon a petition for a refund filed with them, and the term of the license had expired without any attempt on the part of the city authorities to refund.

The right of a holder of a liquor license granted by a city, to recover the unearned portion thereof from the city upon the adoption of state prohibition, is affirmed in Allsman v. Oklahoma City (1908) 21 Okla. 142, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 511, 95 Pac. 468, 17 Ann. Cas. 184.

Where both a city and a county license are required by a dealer in intoxicating liquors selling within a city, the holder of a city license who was denied a county license for the reason that, before he applied for the county license, the city had held a local option election by which the sale of intoxicating liquor was prohibited, has been held, in Sharp v. Carthage (1892) 48 Mo. App. 26, entitled to recover from the city the unearned portion of his license, although the Local Option Law provided that the adoption of prohibition in any county or city should not be so construed as to interfere with any license issued before the day of election under the law, but that such license might run until the day of its expiration. The court argued, in support of its decision, that when the city, immediately after issuing its license, "voted against the sale of intoxicating liquors within its boundaries, it thereby effectually prohibited the county court from granting a license to plaintiff, and rendered its own license worthless." The fact that the license was issued a short time before the holding of the local option election at which the sale of intoxicating liquors was prohibited is held entitled to no weight, as the holder had the right to assume that the city would not at once revoke the license which it had granted to him. In this case the license was taken out on the day preceding the election.

It is held in Bart v. Pierce County (1911) 60 Wash. 507, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1151, 111 Pac. 582, that a county which has for a fee granted a license to sell intoxicating liquor within its limits for a certain period is, so far as the funds remain within its control, bound to return the unearned portion thereof, if, before the expiration of the prescribed period, the territory where the business is conducted becomes incorporated as a municipal corporation, which assumes the regulation of the traffic within its limits and requires the payment to it of a fee for the privilege of conducting the business. It was conceded in this case that the county license became inoperative upon the incorporation of the territory into the town.

As stated above, some courts take the view that the holder of a license who has taken it out while a statute is in effect permitting local prohibition cannot recover the unearned portion thereof after the sale is prohibited by virtue of such statute, and this is held true whether or not the license is revoked. Peyton v. Hot Springs Co. (1890) 53 Ark. 236, 13 S. W. 764; Alexander v. State (1905) 77 Ark. 294, 91 S. W. 181, see supra. The court in MILLER v. CENTRAL CITY, ante, 240, being committed to the doctrine that the local option election in favor of prohibiting the sale does not interfere with existing licenses, holds that one who has voluntarily surrendered his license cannot recover the unearned license fee. It has been held under the peculiar facts set out in Sharp v. Carthage (Mo.) supra, that, even though the local option election does not interfere with the license issued previously thereto, the licensee is entitled to recover the unearned portion thereof.

In Nurnberger v. Barnwell (1894) 42 S. C. 158, 20 S. E. 14, a state law had been enacted limiting the time for which municipal authorities could grant licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquor subsequently to the enactment of this statute. The municipal authorities granted the plaintiff in this case a license to sell intoxicating liquor extending beyond the period set by the statute, the plaintiff being induced to pay the excess beyond this period by the promise of the town authorities that, if the license was illegal and void after the period fixed by statute and the plaintiff was not allowed by law to carry on his business as a retail liquor dealer, the town would repay to the plaintiff the excess. Upon these facts the holder of the license was held entitled to recover the unearned portion thereof, the license being held illegal beyond the period fixed in the statute.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John A. Gray for appellant.

Messrs. Theobald & Theobald, for appellees:

Plaintiff has no standing in a court of equity nor in law, nor can he enforce his proposed contract in law or equity.

1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 2d ed. §§ 397-399; American Asso. v. Innis, 109 Ky. 595, 60 S. W. 388; 9 Cyc. 505, 546, 562; Averbeck v. Hall, 14 Bush, 505; Kimbrough v. Lane, 11 Bush, 556.

Mr. J. J. C. Johnson also for appellees.

Hurt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was instituted in the Elliott circuit court by the appellant, H. V. Johnson, against the appellee Lucy Johnson McMILLON, to recover against her a personal judgment for the sum of a promissory note and its accrued interest, which the appellee, while a married woman, and her former husband, Ell Johnson, had executed to appellant on the 30th day of July, 1909, and also to enforce a mortgage lien upon borrower's intention so to use it, is treated in the annotation following this case, post, 247.

the appellee's lands, and to secure an order of sale of the lands to satisfy the debt represented by the note. The mortgage, as alleged, had been executed to appellant by the appellee and her husband at the time of the execution of the note, to secure its payment. The lands embraced in the mortgage were owned by the appellee, and not her husband. The husband of appellee, with whom she joined in the execution of the note and mortgage, was killed a few weeks after the note and mortgage were executed. As defenses to a recovery by the appellant, the appellee pleaded that the note was without a valuable consideration as to her; that the consideration of the note was illegal and vicious; that she was compelled, by duress exerted upon her by her husband, with the knowledge and contrivance of the appellant, to execute the note and mortgage, against her will and consent; that appellant and her husband conspired together and fraudulently procured her to execute the note and mortgage, when same were without any consideration as to her; and that the acknowledgment of the mortgage by her was before an unauthorized person, who had no authority to take acknowledgments of mortgages or deeds executed by a feme covert, and that his certificate thereon of such acknowledgment was a mistake. A considerable quantity of evidence was taken upon the various issues made, and upon a submission of the action the circuit court adjudged that the appellant was not entitled to any recovery, and that his petition be dismissed, and from the judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

Because of the conclusion which has been reached, it is found to be unnecessary to advert to more than one of the grounds presented in resistance of the recovery upon the note and mortgage. Passing over the controversy as to whether the note was executed as a promise to pay the debt of the appellee or the debt of her husband, or whether she executed it under fear of violence at the hands of her husband, the facts about which there seems to be controversy are that Ell Johnson, in the early part of the year 1908, killed his brother-in-law, who was a brother of appellee, and thereafter was indicted for the crime of wilful murder, and was incarcerated in jail, awaiting trial, in September of that year. His father and the appellant, his brother, and two or more brothers-in-law and the appellee, gathered at Sandy Hook for the purpose of assisting him in procuring counsel for his defense, and otherwise rendering him assistance in the defense of the prosecution. Attorneys were secured for him and four notes were executed to them for their fees, and the appellant became an obligor upon the notes, as well as his father, and a brother-in-law subscribed at least two of the notes. The appellee was an obligor upon one or more of the notes, and Ell Johnson seems to have subscribed to one of them and possibly all of them. The evidence as to who were the obligors upon these notes is very contradictory and far from satisfactory. Ell Johnson underwent a trial and was convicted in the early part of the year 1909, but upon appeal by him the judgment was reversed and a new trial granted, and he was admitted to bail in the month of June, 1909.

Regardless of who were the obligors upon the notes, they were regarded by the parties as representing the debts of Ell Johnson, and by an arrangement between him and appellant, the appellant discharged two of the notes and portions of two others, and Ell Johnson paid to him the amount of one of the notes, and also some other small payments. The appellant also paid for and furnished to Ell Johnson other sums of money for purposes connected with his defense to the indictment for murder, as well as for some other purposes, and in July, 1909, the appellant rendered to Ell Johnson and the appellee a statement of the matters between them. The statement was in the shape of an account against Ell Johnson, showing the amounts of money which appellant had paid for and furnished to him, and also a statement of the amounts which he had received from Ell Johnson. The balance was the consideration for the note sued upon, and for which the mortgage sued upon was executed to secure. Of the consideration for the note, three of the items, which amounted together to $162.50, were sums of money which had been furnished by the appellant to Ell Johnson for the purpose of procuring a witness for the commonwealth of Kentucky in the prosecution against Ell Johnson to leave the state of Kentucky, and to keep her out of the jurisdiction of the court, for the purpose of preventing her from giving testimony against Ell Johnson in the prosecution against him for murder. These sums of money were furnished by appellant with the full knowledge of the purpose for which they were to be used, and for the purpose of being so used, and were used for that purpose, as appears from the testimony of the appellant. It seems that the witness thus corrupted and carried out of the jurisdiction of the court, so as to be prevented from testifying for the commonwealth in the prosecution, was the only witness whose testimony was deemed to be dangerous to the safety from conviction of Ell Johnson. It scarcely seems necessary to say that a promise, the consideration of which is illegal, will not be enforced. An enforceable contract must be based upon a valid consideration, and if the consideration is illegal, the contract is void.

At the common law, the obstruction of justice in the courts was a misdemeanor and an indictable offense, and the spiriting away of a witness to prevent the witness from testifying was always held to be one method of obstructing justice in the courts, and in order to constitute this offense, it was not necessary that the witness should have been under subpoena or recognizance. Com. v. Berry, 141 Ky. 477, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 976, 133 S. W. 212, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 516. A promise, the consideration for which is an agreement to defeat or hinder the administration of the criminal laws, is always void, as against public policy, and is not enforceable. Averbeck v. Hall, 14 Bush, 505; Swan v. Chandler, 8 B. Mon. 97; 9 Cyc. 500. There is some divergence of opinion as to whether or not a promise to repay money loaned for an illegal purpose is void, but the rule is thus stated in 6 R. C. L. p. 696, as follows: The "mere knowledge of the borrower's unlawful intention . . . does not ordinarily render the contract illegal, although it is otherwise where money is loaned for the express purpose of being used in an illegal transaction."

And further: "It undoubtedly is a correct principle, it has been said, that one who furnishes funds to another, who he knows or has every reason to believe intends to devote them to the perpetration of crime, and seeks to procure them for that purpose, will not be allowed to maintain an action on his contract." 6 R. C. L. p. 697.

Hence any promise which Ell Johnson might have made to repay to appellant the money thus illegally furnished for such illegal and vicious purpose would not be enforceable, as the appellant was a participant with Ell Johnson in violating the law and assisting him in the obstruction of public justice by furnishing the money necessary to accomplish the purpose of spiriting away the witness beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and keeping her away by means of money furnished, to prevent her from testifying. The money, it seems, was furnished for that express purpose. This money so furnished constitutes a part of the consideration for the note sued on. A L.R.A.1918C.

portion of the consideration for the note was, however, sums of money which were furnished to Ell Johnson for legitimate purposes, and the question is thus presented: If a part of the consideration for a promise is legal and valid, and a part is illegal, can the promise be enforced to the extent of the legal consideration, and held invalid to the extent that the consideration is illegal? Can you thus split up a single promise and divide its effects? This question is answered in 9 Cyc. 566, as follows: "If any part of a single consideration for one or more promises be illegal, or if there are several consideration for one promise, some of which are legal and others illegal, the promise is wholly void, as it is impossible to say which part or which one of the considerations induced the promise."

In Kimbrough v. Lane, 11 Bush, 556, it is said: A "part of the entire consideration . . . be vicious, the whole contract is void."

The rule is different where the consideration or all of the considerations, if there be more than one, are legal, and they are relied upon to support several promises made because of these considerations, some of which are legal and others illegal. In such states of case, if the legal promises can be separated from the illegal ones, the legal ones may be enforced, while the illegal are held void. It will be observed, in the instant case, that the note is a single promise, and a part of the consideration for it being illegal, it vitiates the entire promise, in accordance with the rule first stated, as was held in Brown v. Langford, 3 Bibb, 500, where it was said: "There is no question but that a promise founded upon several considerations, one of which is vicious, is void; and the same principle requires that a covenant should be held to be so, if the consideration be in part affected with turpitude."

In addition to the above-cited authorities, the principles above stated have been upheld by this court in Collins v. Merrell, 2 Met. (Ky.) 163; Bugg v. Holt, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 1208, 97 S. W. 29; McLane v. Dixon, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 683, 99 S. W. 601; Smith v. Corbin, 135 Ky. 729, 123 S. W. 277; Newport Rolling Mills Co. v. Hall, 147 Ky. 598, 144 S. W. 760; Gardner v. Maxey, 9 B. Mon. 90; Donallen v. Lennox, 6 Dana, 89; Stratton v. Wilson, 170 Ky. 61, 185 S. W. 522. The note which the mortgage was executed to secure being void and uncollectable, the mortgage is also void.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

I. Introductory.

It will be seen that the cases on this subject are in a good deal of confusion. It is a logical rather than a practical distinction which separates the lender who has mere knowledge of the borrower's illegal purpose from one who lends for the illegal purpose without participating in it or making it a condition. Further, the subject is peculiarly one of those in which rules are likely to bend to the individual case; or, in other words, that leave too much to the judge or jury. In the absence of statute the lender's mere knowledge of the possibility that the money lent may be used for an illegal purpose seems, in general, not sufficient to prevent its recovery, and yet there are some purposes so nefarious that the citizen should be scrupulous to see that he gives them no aid. If, for example, the borrower requires the money for bribery, or to enable him to kill someone, or to use it in facilitating the escape of an enemy spy, the lender will not find much sympathy from his fellow citizens in or out of court.

This note excludes loans by agents, loans by one jointly interested, and paper in the hands of bona fide holders.

II. Money loaned before the illegal transaction.

There are a number of cases laying down the rule of distinction between the lender who merely knows of the borrower's intent to put the money to an illegal use and one who lends for the express purpose that the money be put to such use.

"The mere knowledge of the lender of money, of the illegal use that the borrower intends to make of the money, is not enough, of itself, to fix the stain of illegality upon the lender. In order to do so, it must appear that the lender made the loan for the purpose to enable the borrower to do the illegal act." McGavock v. Puryear (1868) 6 Coldw. (Tenn.) 34 (note given to raise money to equip Confederate cavalry); Bond v. Perkins (1871) 4 Heisk. (Tenn.) 364; Jones v. Planters' Bank (1872) 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 455; Puryear v. McGavock (1871) 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 461.

A loan to a company with knowledge that the same was obtained to enable it to make iron for the Confederate government cannot be recovered, but if the loan was made to be used as the company pleased, "but without any understanding that it was to be used in building works for the manufacture of iron for the Confederate States, or any other illegal purpose, his mere knowledge that it was engaged in such illegal business, and might possibly or probably use the funds so obtained from him in advancing such work, would not affect his contract injuriously." Oxford Iron Co. v. Spradley (1874) 51 Ala. 171.

While mere knowledge of the lender that the borrower intends to use the money in illegal speculation will not prevent a recovery of the money loaned, if the borrower is active in furthering the illegal speculation, he cannot recover such money. Singleton v. Bank of Monticello (1901) 113 Ga. 527, 38 S. E. 947.

The mere knowledge that the borrower intends to use the money in a wagering transaction in oil is not sufficient to defeat recovery; the loan must be for the express purpose of enabling him to commit an unlawful act. Waugh v. Beck (1886) 114 Pa. 422, 60 Am. Rep. 354, 6 Atl. 923, where there was no prohibiting statute.

If a person who advances money to another knows that he proposes to use it to gamble on the bourse, that will not take away his right to repayment if he has not participated in the gambling, and has not advanced the money to aid it. Venne v. Christin (1899) Rap. Jud. Quebec 16 C. S. 164.

In Tyler v. Carlisle (1887) 79 Me. 210, 1 Am. St. Rep. 301, 9 Atl. 356, the court, in affirming a verdict for the defendant, held that if the plaintiff lent the money with an express understanding, intention, and purpose that it was to be used to gamble with, and it was so used, the debt so created could not be recovered; but otherwise if the plaintiff had merely knowledge that the money was to be so used.

It has been held that a recovery of money loaned will not be defeated by mere knowledge that the money might be used in an illegal enterprise (Lewis v. Alexander (1879) 51 Tex. 578; Cleveland v. Taylor (1908) 49 Tex. Civ. App. 496, 108 S. W. 1037, gambling); nor by mere knowledge that the borrower is to use the money to suppress a threatened criminal prosecution of her husband (Hines v. Union Sav. Bank & T. Co. (1904) 120 Ga. 711, 48 S. E. 120, loan by a bank); nor by knowledge that the borrower is to use the money to pay off existing encumbrances on property used for lewd purposes and which is thereafter so to be used (Mechanics' Realty & Improv. Co. v. Leva (1915) 16 Ga. App. 7, 84 S. E. 222); nor by mere knowledge that the borrower intends to use the money by engaging in the purchase of options on grain in the market of another state, or investing it in wagering or gambling contracts (Jackson v. City Nat. Bank (1890) 125 Ind. 347, 9 L.R.A. 657, 25 N. E. 430); nor by simple knowledge that the borrower intended to use money advanced on a note or bond for arming or equipping a military company to engage in the Rebellion (Walker v. Jeffries (1871) 45 Miss. 160).

Where a creditor lends his debtor more money bona fide in order to obtain security for the whole, which he does in the form of a bill of sale, such bill will be good although the creditor knew that the debtor had committed forgery and might use some of the money advanced by the creditor to leave the country. Bagot v. Arnott (1867) Ir. Rep. 2 C. L. 1.

Mere knowledge of the lender that the borrower intended to use the money in illegal speculation will not bar recovery of the money. Plank v. Jackson (1891) 128 Ind. 424, 26 N. E. 568, where the court said: "The statute, doubtless, was L.R.A. 1918C.

enacted to prevent the borrowing of money to be at the time wagered; it provides that notes given 'for repaying any money lent at the time of such wager for the purpose of being wagered shall be void,' and by its language covers cases of loaning money at the time of the wager for the purpose of being wagered, and does not include cases where money is borrowed with an intention on the part of the borrower to invest it in some speculative transaction at some time in the future, or to pay losses theretofore sustained."

In Corbin v. Wachhorst (1887) 73 Cal. 411, 15 Pac. 22, it was held that the plaintiff might recover on a promissory note given for money lent by him to the defendant during play at dice, in which the plaintiff was engaged part of the time, the plaintiff not being a winner at the game, which was not forbidden by statute.

So, also, it has been held that a conveyance of property to a broker knowing that it could or would be used to assist him in his illegal business of dealing in cotton futures might be set aside (Futch v. Sanger (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 163 S. W. 597); that money lent in New Jersey to bet on an election could be recovered in Pennsylvania, there being no evidence of any prohibiting statute in New Jersey (Scott v. Duffy (1849) 14 Pa. 18); and that money lent in a foreign country for the purpose of being used by the borrower for gaming, the game not being illegal by the law of that country, could be recovered in the English courts (Saxby v. Fulton [1909] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 208, 4 B. R. C. 381, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 781, 101 L. T. N. S. 179, 25 Times L. R. 446, 53 Sol. Jo. 379, 17 Ann. Cas. 39).

On the other hand, it has been held that there could be no recovery for money lent to be used to suppress a criminal prosecution (Plumer v. Smith (1832) 5 N. H. 553, 22 Am. Dec. 478); for money lent a Confederate county (on its bonds) to buy salt with to counteract the effect of the United States blockade (Leak v. Richmond County (1870) 64 N. C. 133; Setzer v. Catawba County (1878) 64 N. C. 516; Brickell v. Halifax (1879) 81 N. C. 240); for money knowingly lent on a note to hire a substitute to put into the Confederate army (Kingsbury v. Flemming (1872) 66 N. C. 524); so of money lent on a bond to hire such a substitute (Critcher v. Holloway (1870) 64 N. C. 526; Kingsbury v. Gooch (1870) 64 N. C. 528); so of money knowingly lent on a bond for equipping a volunteer Confederate company (Smitherman v. Sanders (1870) 64 N. C. 522); so of money knowingly lent on bonds to buy a forge to make iron for the Confederate government (Logan v. Plummer (1874) 70 N. C. 388); and so of money lent for the express purpose of prohibited gambling in futures (Catton v. Catton (1912) 69 Wash. 130, 124 Pac. 387).

In a case where the jury found that the plaintiff bank, in cashing a check, had no knowledge as to the purpose for which the money was to be used, it was stated that if it had cashed the check knowing the money was to be used in gambling, it could not recover, gambling being unlawful by the laws of the state. Camas Prairie State Bank v. Newman (1909) 15 Idaho, 719, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 703, 128 Am. St. Rep. 81, 99 Pac. 833.

In Schirm v. Wieman (1906) 103 Md. 541, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 175, 115 Am. St. Rep. 373, 63 Atl. 1056, 7 Ann. Cas. 1008, in holding that there was no illegal act or intent on the part of anyone, the court said: "It undoubtedly is a correct principle that one who furnishes funds to another who he knows or has every reason to believe intends to devote them to the perpetration of crime, and that they were procured for that purpose, will not be allowed to maintain an action on his contract. He cannot do so for the reason that, as was said (Hanauer v. Doane (1871) 12 Wall. (U. S.) 347, 20 L. ed. 441) by Judge Story in his Conflict of Laws, § 253: 'No one can hesitate to say that such a man voluntarily aids in the perpetration of the fraud, and, morally speaking, is almost, if not quite, as guilty as the principal offender.'"

Statutes.

Apart from advances by brokers in prohibited speculations, most of the cases expressly decided upon statutes relate to gambling transactions. These statutes are more or less framed on the lines of the Statute of 9 Anne, chap. 14, providing that "all notes," etc., "securities," etc., "for the reimbursing or repaying any Money knowingly lent, or advanced for such gaming or betting as aforesaid, or lent or advanced at the Time and Place of such Play, to any Person or Persons so gaming or betting as aforesaid, or that shall, during such Play, so play or bett, shall be utterly void, frustrate, and of none Effect, to all intents and purposes whatsoever."

At first it was the disposition of the courts to hold under this statute that while securities for loans for gambling could not be enforced, the money lent could be recovered, as it was not a "security" within the statute. Barjeau v. Walmsley (1746) 2 Strange, 1249, 93 Eng. Reprint, 1161; Wettenhall v. Wood (1793) 1 Esp. (Eng.) 18.

So in Robinson v. Bland (1760) 1 W. Bl. 234, 96 Eng. Reprint, 129, where the plaintiff sued on the common counts and on a bill of exchange given him by the defendant in France, partly for money lent at the time and place of play and partly for money won at play, it was held that while the bill was void, the plaintiff might recover on the common counts for the money lent, but not for that won.

But in M'Kinnell v. Robinson (1838) 3 Mees & W. 434, 150 Eng. Reprint, 1215, 7 L. J. Exch. N. S. 149, where it was held that money lent for the purpose of illegally playing and gaming therewith at hazard, a prohibited game, could not be recovered, the court doubted the cases of Barjeau v. Walmsley (Eng.) supra, and Alcinbrook v. Hall (1766) 2 Wils. 309, 95 Eng. Reprint, 828, infra.

There seems still, however, to have been some uncertainty about the matter, as appears from the decision in Quarrier v. Colston (1842) 6 Jur. 959, 1 Phill. Ch. 147, 41 Eng. Reprint, 587, 12 L. J. Ch. N. S. 57, where it was held that equity will not enjoin an action on an I. O. U. for money lent at Baden Baden, to be employed there for gambling, it not appearing that the game was illegal there or in England, the court saying: "Until the late case of M'Kinnell v. Robinson, in the court of exchequer, it had been supposed that in all cases, although securities given for money won at play were void by the Statute of Anne, yet that the money might be recovered."

(See further as to the conflict of laws on this subject the notes in 64 L.R.A. 160, and 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 650).

In the American courts no distinction is made in general between securities and money, and some of the statutes are explicit on the subject.

A note given in part for money loaned while the parties were playing poker, to be used in the game, is void under the Statute of Anne in force in Maryland, and a judgment upon such note will be enjoined as void. Emerson v. Townsend (1890) 73 Md. 224, 20 Atl. 984.

In Mordecai v. Dawkins (1856) 9 Rich. L. (S. C.) 262, it was held that a note given for money knowingly lent to gamble with at the time and place of play was void by the Statute of Anne and the South Carolina statute, and that a verbal promise to repay the money was void; this apparently overrules Carsan v. Rambert (1804) 2 Bay (S. C.) 562, where it was held that the value of a horse lent to stake on a game of cards might be recovered, as the statutes merely declare void gambling contracts and securities for their performance.

In Ruckman v. Bryan (1846) 3 Denio (N. Y.) 340, the court considered that the Statute of Anne, as lately construed by the English courts, prevented the recovery of money lent for gaming or betting, and held that where two parties made a bet with a third party on a horse race, and one of them advanced to the stakeholder the share of his betting partner, and the bet was lost, that the advancer could not recover the money of such partner.

In Peck v. Briggs (1846) 3 Denio (N. Y.) 107, where the court stated that he did not see how money knowingly lent for the purpose of betting or gaming could be recovered from the borrower under the New York statute, which went further than the Statute of Anne, A and B, wishing to bet with each other on an election, borrowed the money from C and made him stakeholder; A winning the bet, C paid him the money on his promise to repay B's stake if B failed to pay the loan. B failing to pay the loan, A desired C to sue, agreeing that if the suit failed A would pay the loan and costs and expenses. It was held on the failure of the suit that A was liable to C for the loan and costs and expenses.

Money lent while the parties and others were gaming and playing at cards, for the purpose of enabling the borrower to continue such gaming and playing, cannot be recovered where the statute declares that all notes, bills, bonds, mortgages, and other securities, given for money won, or for repaying any money knowingly lent for any gaming or betting, shall be void and of no effect, as between the parties to the same. White v. Buss (1849) 3 Cush. (Mass.) 448.

A promise to pay for a thing lent to a person then engaged in a game, to be bet therein, was held to be void by the statute of Virginia in force in Kentucky, providing that every promise, etc., to repay or secure money or other thing lent or advanced for the purpose of gaming, etc., shall be void. Levy v. Perkins (1817) 4 Bibb. (Ky.) 505. It was similarly held as to a note given for lottery tickets advanced for the purpose of being staked, etc. Colyer v. Ransom (1817) 4 Bibb (Ky.) 552.

A note given for money loaned to the maker at the time and place of making an election bet is void under the statute providing that a security "for the reimbursing or repaying any money knowingly lent or advanced, . . . to any person or persons . . . wagering. . . . or that shall at such time and place so 'wager,' " is "utterly void, frustrate, and of none effect, to all intents and purposes whatsoever." Machir v. Moore (1845) 2 Gratt. (Va.) 258.

Money loaned in the state for the purpose of gaming in or out of the state cannot be recovered where the statute provides that every contract "for the consideration of money, property, or other thing lent or advanced for the purpose of gaming, or lent or advanced at the time of any betting, gaming, or wagering, to a person then actually engaged in betting, gaming, or wagering, shall be void." Collins v. Merrell (1859) 2 Met. (Ky.) 163. So where the money was advanced by pool sellers on horse races to enable the defendant to buy a pool on a horse race. Alfriend v. Hughes (1868) 4 Bush (Ky.) 40. So where the money was advanced by placing bets on horse races for the defendant at his request. McDevitt v. Thomas (1908) 130 Ky. 805, 114 S. W. 273.

Money advanced to pay losses at poker to third parties in games in some of which the lender participated, the lender having promised to pay such losses before the end of the first game, cannot be recovered where the statute provides that all promises "where the whole or any part of the consideration of such promise, agreement, . . . or other security shall be for money or other valuable thing whatsoever won or lost, laid or staked, or betted at or upon any game of any kind or under any name whatsoever, or by any means, . . . or for the repayment of money or other thing of value, lent or advanced at the time and for the purpose, of any game, play, bet or wager, or of being laid, staked, betted or wagered thereon shall be absolutely void." Schoenberg v. Adler (1900) 105 Wis. 645, 81 N. W. 1055.

A check given for money borrowed to gamble with and later lost to the lender cannot support a recovery by one who acquired it when aware of the circumstances, the statute providing that "all notes, bills, bonds, mortgages, or other securities, or other conveyances, the consideration for which shall be money or other things of value, won by playing at any unlawful game, shall be void and of no effect as between the parties to the same and all other persons, except holders in good faith without notice of the illegality of such contract or conveyance." Ash v. Clark (1903) 32 Wash. 390, 73 Pac. 351.

The statute of New York is clearly broad enough to cover the decision in Johnson v. Clark (1898) 23 Misc. 346, 51 N. Y. Supp. 238, holding that jewelry given to secure poker chips advanced by the defendant to be used in a game in which both parties participated might be recovered by the plaintiff, a minor; and that in Ransom v. Vermilyea (1887) 11 N. Y. S. R. 683, holding that chips lent to be played with in a poker game in which the parties participated cannot be the subject of recovery.

In Scott v. Baker (1908) 143 Ill. App. 151, it was held that money lent knowing that it was to be used in prohibited speculation could not be recovered, the statutes providing that option contracts should be considered gambling contracts and should be void, and that "all promises . . . the whole or any part of the consideration whereof, shall be for money . . . won by gaming . . . or for the reimbursing or paying any money or property knowingly lent or advanced at the time and place of such play or bet to any person or persons so gaming or betting, or that shall, during such play or betting, so play or bet, shall be void and of no effect."

On the other hand, money lent to be gambled with in the lender's house may be recovered where the statute merely prohibits the recovery of money won at gambling. Vasquez v. Florence (1905) 5 Philippine, 183.

In Ensley v. Patterson (1862) 19 Ind. 95, it was held that to defeat a note given for money lent for the purpose of wagering and betting on an election, it must be alleged that the money was lent at the time of such wager, when the statute declared void all notes, etc., "for repaying any money lent at the time of such wager, for the purpose of being wagered."

And in Longnecker v. Shields (1891) 1 Colo. App. 264, 28 Pac. 659, it was held that there is nothing illegal in advancing money to enable the borrower to start a "faro bank" within the statute providing that all contracts, etc., and notes for the reimbursing or paying any money or property knowingly lent or advanced at the time or place of such play, to any person or persons so gaming or betting, shall be utterly void and of no effect.

Lender an active participant.

It would seem clear that the lender ought not to recover where he is an active participant in the illegal use of the money, as was clearly the case in JOHNSON v. McMILLON, ante, 244.

Thus, where the plaintiff and the defendant, who was the master of a vessel, and also the vessel, were taken by the enemy, and the plaintiff advanced money to ransom the vessel, for which the defendant gave him a bill of exchange, it was held that both parties were equally to be benefited by the transaction, and that the plaintiff could not recover on the bill, the ransoming being forbidden by the statute and securities given for ransom being void. Webb v. Brooke (1910) 3 Taunt. 6, 128 Eng. Reprint, 3.

So, if the lender of money to a wife to enable her to compromise a criminal prosecution actually participates in such employment of the money, he cannot recover it. Pierson v. Green (1904) 69 S. C. 559, 48 S. E. 624.

"Where the party advancing, or even loaning, the money, participates and shares in the gambling transaction thus promoted by his act, he thereby becomes a particeps criminis, and cannot recover for money loaned or advanced under such circumstances." Appleton v. Maxwell (1901) 10 N. M. 748, 55 L.R.A. 93, 65 Pac. 158.

The following three cases seem to belong to the same class, although the court did not expressly comment on the feature of the participation of the lender. Thus, in Bates v. Watson (1853) 1 Sneed (Tenn.) 376, it was held that money lent for the express purpose of being staked on an election bet could not be recovered (where there was evidence that the lender was interested in the bet). And in Cutler v. Welsh (1862) 43 N. H. 497, it was held that money knowingly lent to be used for the purpose of gambling could not be recovered nor could there be a recovery on a note given for such money (where, however, most of the money was lost to the plaintiff). And in Viser v. Bertrand (1853) 14 Ark. 267, it was held that money advanced to a husband at the wife's request, by her counsel, the consideration being that the husband would make no opposition to a pending divorce suit, could not be recovered, although she, after the divorce, expressly promised to pay it.

III. Money loaned to pay an illegal debt.

It will be observed that when the illegal transaction has been completed, and all that remains is the payment of a debt incurred therein, the lending of money to pay such debt seems, generally speaking, to be looked upon by the courts with greater favor than the lending of money to engage upon an illegal enterprise.

In Armstrong v. Toler (1826) 11 Wheat. (U. S.) 258, 6 L. ed. 468, Marshall, Ch. J. said: "The general proposition stated by Lord Mansfield in Faikney v. Reynous (1767) 4 Burr. 2069, 98 Eng. Reprint, 79, that if one person pay the debt of another at his request, an action may be sustained to recover the money, although the original contract was unlawful, goes far in deciding the question now before the court. That the person who paid the money knew it was paid in discharge of a debt not recoverable at law has never been held to alter the case. A subsequent express promise is, undoubtedly, equivalent to a previous request."

In Leavitt v. Blatchford (1848) 5 Barb. (N. Y.) 9, it is said that where the statute does not make the payment of an illegal debt illegal, a promise to pay a loan made to pay the illegal debt is not illegal.

Where losses have been incurred in an illegal transaction a person who lends money to the loser with which to pay the debt can recover the loan, notwithstanding his knowledge of the fact that the money was to be so used. Armstrong v. American Exch. Nat. Bank (1889) 133 U. S. 433, 33 L. ed. 747, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 450 (possibly not necessary to decision); Sampson v. Camperdown Cotton Mills (1897) 82 Fed. 833 (possibly not necessary to decision).

So it has been held that there may be a recovery for money advanced as loans to pay the borrower's losses in illegal speculations (Ballard v. Green (1896) 118 N. C. 390, 24 S. E. 777); on a note for money knowingly lent to pay accrued margins on a prohibited option contract (Charleston State Bank v. Edman (1900) 99 Ill. App. 235); on a note for goods delivered at the maker's request to pay his election bet (White v. Yarbrough (1849) 16 Ala. 109); for the value of goods furnished on store orders to pay the drawer's gambling debt (English v. Young (1849) 10 B. Mon. (Ky.) 141). So it has been said that one might recover money lent to pay a gambling debt (McKinney v. Pope (1842) 3 B. Mon. (Ky.) 93); and the same was held where it seems that the lender did not know of the purpose (Cooley v. Allen (1906) 28 Ky. L. Rep. 982, 90 S. W. 1048).

Money loaned to pay gaming debts may be recovered. It is not within the prohibition in the statute against contracts "to repay or secure money or other thing lent or advanced for that purpose, or lent or advanced at the time of such gaming," although lent at a gaming place. Smith v. Harris (1856) 3 Sneed (Tenn.) 553.

It was said obiter in Jacoby v. Heidelberg (1900) 33 Misc. 111, 67 N. Y. Supp. 146, that the principle is now well settled with respect to gambling contracts that where a loss is already incurred, any person other than the winner who advances money or other property to the loser to enable him to pay the loss may recover such advance in the absence of a special statute.

In Greathouse v. Throckmorton (1831) 7 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 16, A, losing $150 at cards to B, requested C to pay it, and C did so by crediting B the amount which B owed him, of which part was for a gambling debt; it was held that C might recover the $150 from A notwithstanding the statute made void all promises "to any person or for his use" in consideration of money or property "by him won, or whereof money or other thing so won, lent, or advanced, shall be a part or all of the consideration money."

It may be noted, while beyond the scope of this note, that where A and B jointly bet and lost on an election, and A paid more than his share of the loss, it was held that he might recover on a note B gave him for the excess (Brooks v. Brady (1893) 53 Ill. App. 155), although the statute made void all promises, notes, etc., made, etc., or "for the reimbursing or paying any money or property knowingly lent or advanced at the time and place of such play or bet."

Money advanced to pay losses in option deals in another state is not unrecoverable where the statute of such other state merely provides that "a contract for the purchase or sale of a commodity of any kind, to be delivered at a future day, the parties not intending that the commodity is to be actually delivered in kind and the price paid, shall not be enforced by any court: nor shall any contract of the kind commonly called 'futures' be enforced, nor shall a contract in this section mentioned be a valid consideration, in whole or in part, for any promises or undertaking." Searles v. Lum (1901) 89 Mo. App. 235.

Where a note with a surety was given for money borrowed to hire a substitute to put into the Confederate army, and the surety paid it at the request of the principal, who gave him a new note, it was held that the surety might recover on the new note. Powell v. Smith (1872) 66 N. C. 401.

It may be noted that it was held in Stewart v. Miller (1887) 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 356, that if the loser at play gives to a third person, not a player, a draft, and asks him to cash it and pay the debt and he does so, such third person may recover of the drawer.

But one lending money to pay card debts cannot recover it if he has any percentage or commission on the money staked in the play. White v. Wilson (1897) 100 Ky. 367, 37 L.R.A. 197, 38 S. W. 495.

In St. Croix v. Morris (1885) 1 Cal. & El. (Eng.) 485, it was held that the secretary of a club where baccarat was played could not recover on a check given him by the defendant for counters with which to pay his losses at the game, as the plaintiff was really a party to the gambling transaction.

In Alcinbrook v. Hall (1766) 2 Wils. 309, 95 Eng. Reprint, 828, it was held under the Statute of Anne that assumpsit would lie for money paid by the plaintiff for the defendant, lost on a horse race, as the statute did not contain the word "contract." And in Hussey v. Crickitt (1811) 3 Campb. 168, it was held that where the winner of a dinner paid for it, he might recover the amount from the loser.

In Hill v. Fox (1859) 4 Hurlst & N. 359, 157 Eng. Reprint, 879, where the defendant, desiring to pay the plaintiff and others money lost in betting on horse races, borrowed money of the plaintiff, giving him an agreement to give certain security, and paid him what he had lost to him, it was held that the court properly instructed the jury to the effect that "if you believe that this deed, which upon the face of it purports to be a security for a sum of £2,000, money lent, is merely a colorable transaction for the purpose of passing the money and carrying into effect an illegal agreement, then the deed is void; but if you are of opinion that there was no such stipulation, and that the plaintiff advanced the £2,000 as a loan, and put it into the hands of the defendant as the lawful owner, to do with it as he pleased, the deed is perfectly valid although the plaintiff expected to be paid his bets out of the money so lent."

On the other hand, there are numerous cases, most of them decided under statutes, which hold that the money loaned to pay the illegal debt could not be recovered.

In Hanauer v. Doane (1870) 12 Wall. (U. S.) 342, 20 L. ed. 439, it was held that one who, at the defendant's request, took up his duebills issued to pay for stores supplied by the defendant to the Confederate government, could not recover on promissory notes given in place of the bills. But the court stated that if the plaintiff had knowingly lent money to take up the duebills, the loan would have been legal as one degree further removed from the illegal transaction.

In Scollans v. Flynn (1876) 120 Mass. 271, it was held that money paid to satisfy a third person's betting debt could not be recovered from him where the statute provided that the loser might recover back from the winner money lost.

In Ayer v. Younker (1897) 10 Colo. App. 27, 50 Pac. 218, it was held that a note given in part for the payment of gambling losses and in part for money borrowed to gamble with, and lost to the lender, was void under the Colorado statute referred to under Longnecker v. Shields (1891) 1 Colo. App. 264, 28 Pac. 659, supra, under "Statutes."

In Cannan v. Bryce (1819) 3 Barn. & Ald. 179, 106 Eng. Reprint, 628, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 326, it was held that a bond given to secure one who lent the obligor money to pay his losses in an illegal stock-jobbing transaction was void, and that property transferred in payment of the bond might be recovered by the assignees of the bankrupt obligor, the statute (of 7 Geo. II. chap. 8) providing: "That no money or other consideration shall be voluntarily given, paid, had, or received for the compounding, satisfying, or making up any difference for not transferring any public stock, or not performing any contract or agreement stipulated to be performed." The court overruled Faikney v. Reynous (1767) 4 Burr. 2069, 98 Eng. Reprint, 79, where the plaintiff recovered in an action on a bond given to secure the plaintiff for illegal stock-jobbing debts paid by him for the defendant.

Where the plaintiff, to enable the defendant to pay a bet on a horse race which the defendant had lost to a third person, drew a bill of exchange on the defendant which he accepted, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover, as the Statute 5 and 6 Wm. IV. chap. 41, § 1, enacted that such a security should be deemed to have been made for an illegal consideration. Hay v. Ayling (1851) 16 Q. B. (Eng.) 423, 20 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 171, 15 Jur. 605.

In Tatam v. Reeve (1893) 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 44, 62 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 30, 5 Reports, 83, 67 L. T. N. S. 683, 41 Week. Rep. 174, 57 J. P. 118, it was held that one paying the defendant's debts for betting on horse races could not recover the money, as the Statute of 55 and 56 Vict. chap. 9, made null and void any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum paid by him under or in respect to a contract or agreement rendered null and void by the prior Act of 8 and 9 Vict. chap. 109.

And it was held under the same statute that one advancing a stake for the defendant for a boxing match could not recover the money from the defendant though he had won the match and received the stake. Carney v. Plimmer [1897] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 634, 66 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 415, 76 L. T. N. S. 374, 45 Week. Rep. 385, 61 J. P. 324.

So an action will not lie to recover on a check drawn on an English bank by the defendant, given to the plaintiff in Algiers, partly to pay losses at baccarat in Algiers and partly for money advanced for the purpose of playing baccarat there. Moulis v. Owen [1907] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 746, 4 B. R. C. 352, 76 L. J. K. B. N. S. 396, 96 L. T. N. S. 596, 23 Times L. R. 348. (Compare Saxby v.

Fulton [1909] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 208, 4 B. R. C. 381, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 781, 101 L. T. N. S. 179, 25 Times L. R. 446, 53 Sol. Jo. 397, 17 Ann. Cas. 39.)

But in Re O'Shea [1911] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 981, 81 L. J. K. B. N. S. 70, 105 L. T. N. S. 486, it was held that one giving a guaranty to a bank in order that its customer might be enabled to pay betting debts had a sufficient debt to support a bankruptcy petition.

IV. Miscellaneous.

In Lyon v. Respass (1822) 1 Litt. (Ky.) 133, it was held that equity would not enjoin a judgment at law for the recovery of money loaned to gamble with, as if the loan were paid such payment could not be recovered; the borrower should have defended at law.

It may be noted that in Howell v. Stewart (1873) 54 Mo. 400, it was held that where the money loaned had not been used for the illegal purpose it might be recovered; and the court expressed a similar opinion in Williamson v. Baley (1883) 78 Mo. 636. And in Osgood v. Westphelling (1897) 72 Mo. App. 45, it was held that to bar a recovery it must appear that the money was so used; but the contrary was held in Kingsbury v. Flemming (1872) 66 N. C. 524.

The headnote of Fellows v. Van Hyring (1857) 29 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 230, indicates that one actively participating in compounding a felony, who advances the means therefor, cannot recover the advance; but the report is not satisfactory on the question. B. B. B.

Constitutional law — compulsory sewer connection.

1. Act No. 249 of 1912, authorizing municipalities having a sewerage system to compel the owners of property within a distance of 300 feet from a public sewer to connect their premises with the sewerage system, and an ordinance enacted in pursuance thereof, do not violate or invade any

The provisions for the special remedy for enforcing the lien might be unconstitutional without affecting the validity of the provisions creating the lien. A liability created by statute without a special remedy may be enforced by an ordinary action.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of Acadia dismissing a suit filed to enjoin defendants from connecting plaintiff's premises with a sewerage system in compliance with an alleged void statute and ordinance. Affirmed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Philip S. Pugh, for appellant:

An ordinance which provides that the city shall do the work and furnish the materials for making sewerage connections up to within 3 feet of the building to be connected is void as an unreasonable invasion of the rights of property owners.

Slaughter v. O'Berry, 126 N. C. 181, 48 L.R.A. 442, 35 S. E. 241.

Although the title of a statute need not contain all of its details, it shall be such an index as to put those who are to be affected by the act upon inquiry into its contents.

If all of the provisions of an act are so interwoven as to be incapable of distinct separation, or are of such character that it cannot be said that the legislature intended that the valid part should be enforced if the other parts fail, the entire law will be held to be invalid.

1 Lewis, Stat. Constr. 2d ed. ¶ 297; Second Municipality v. Morgan, 1 La. Ann. 111.

Messrs. Harry W. Gueno and Denis T. Canan, Jr., for appellees.

O'Neill, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The mayor and board of aldermen of the city of Crowley adopted an ordinance requiring the owners of all improved property situated within 300 feet from the public sewer to connect their premises with the sewerage system. The ordinance, being Ordinance No. 440, conforms precisely with the statute on the subject (Act No. 249 of L.R.A. 1918C.

1912), granting to municipalities having a public sewerage system the authority exercised in this instance.

The plaintiff, owning improved property within the distance of 300 feet from a public sewer line, but refusing to comply with the ordinance, brought this suit to have the ordinance and the statute decreed unconstitutional, null, and void. He obtained a temporary writ of injunction, preventing the mayor and board of aldermen from entering into a contract with H. S. Sealy, contractor, for the connection of the plaintiff's premises with the sewerage system. He appeals from the judgment rendered, maintaining the ordinance and statute as constitutional and valid, dissolving the writ of injunction, and dismissing his suit.

The grounds on which the plaintiff attacks the constitutionality of the ordinance and the statute, as set forth in his brief, are as follows:

First. That an enforcement of the ordinance would amount to the taking and damaging of private property for public purposes without just or adequate compensation being first paid, and would therefore violate article 167 of the state Constitution.

Second. That the ordinance and the statute are so harsh, unreasonable, arbitrary, and unfair that their enforcement would abridge the privileges and immunities of the plaintiff and deprive him of his liberty and property without due process of law, in violation of article 2 of the state Constitution and the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

Third. That the state Constitution does not confer any authority upon the legislature, nor upon any municipality, to tax private property for the cost of connecting it with a public sewerage system.

Fourth. That to compel the plaintiff to purchase and pay for materials furnished by a contractor under contract with the municipality would deprive the plaintiff of the liberty and freedom of action guaranteed to him by the Constitution of the state and of the United States.

Fifth. That the state Constitution does not authorize the legislature or a municipality to impose a tax lien upon property for the purpose for which it is attempted in this instance, or to enforce such tax lien by summary process; but, on the contrary, by enumerating the purposes for which property may be assessed and sold summarily for taxes, the framers of the Constitution have impliedly forbidden the assessment and summary sale of property for taxes for any other purpose than those enumerated.

Sixth. That §§ 7 and 8 of the statute, purporting to authorize a sale by summary proceedings for the collection of the cost of sewerage connections, are beyond the objects expressed in the title of the statute, contain provisions not mentioned in the title, and are therefore violative of article 31 of the state Constitution; that the legislature has therefore failed to provide a method of proceeding for the enforcement of the statute, and that the entire act is therefore null and void and of no effect.

It does not appear that an enforcement of the ordinance in contest would amount to a taking or damaging of the plaintiff's property in any sense. The constitutional guaranty that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public purposes without just and adequate compensation being first paid has no application to this case.

This ordinance, in our opinion, is not an arbitrary or unreasonable act on the part of the municipal government, but is a legitimate exercise of the police power. See Hutchinson v. Valdosta, 227 U. S. 303, 57 L. ed. 520, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 290. It is argued by the learned counsel for the plaintiff that there is this difference between an ordinance requiring property owners to connect their premises with a public sewer and an ordinance requiring them to pave the sidewalks adjoining their premises; that the one ordinance does, and the other does not, authorize an invasion of private property. But it might as well be contended that municipal ordinances, requiring property owners to keep their premises clean, sanitary, and safe, and providing for an inspection for that purpose, authorize an invasion of private property, and are therefore unconstitutional.

Our attention is called to the fact that the city of Crowley is governed not by a special statute or charter, but by the general law of municipal corporations, Act No. 136 of 1898. It is contended that, as paragraph 31 of § 15 of that statute (re-enacted in the Act No. 114 of 1916) confers upon municipal corporations the power "to pass all ordinances and to enforce the same by fine not to exceed $100 or imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, or both," the ordinance in question could only be enforced by fine or imprisonment, or both fine and imprisonment. The contention of the learned counsel for the plaintiff is that, inasmuch as the municipal government has not provided for the enforcement of this ordinance by fine or imprisonment, it cannot be enforced at all. But it does not follow that, because municipal corporations are given the power to enforce their penal ordinances by a limited fine or term of imprisonment, therefore all municipal ordinances must be enacted in the form of penal laws or ordinances.

There is no force in the contention that it required express constitutional authority for the legislature to enact a law empowering municipal corporations to require property owners to connect their premises with the public sewerage system at the expense of each property owner. It suffices that the Constitution does not prohibit such legislation.

The ordinance in question does not deprive the property owner of his liberty or freedom of action by requiring him to pay for material furnished by a contractor under contract with the municipality. On the contrary, the ordinance allows the property owners ample opportunity to select and purchase material and have the work done.

In that respect, the ordinance differs from that which was declared invalid by the supreme court of North Carolina, in Slaughter v. O'Berry, 126 N. C. 181, 48 L.R.A. 442, 35 S. E. 241.

There being no constitutional inhibition, the legislature and the municipality had the right to impose upon the property owner the cost of connecting his premises with the public sewerage, and to impose a lien upon the property to secure the payment of the debt. The legislature also had authority to provide a special remedy or summary process for the enforcement of the lien and the collection of the debt. Sections 7 and 8 of Act No. 249 of 1912 make provision for that special remedy or summary process. If those provisions of the statute are not constitutional, because their object is not expressed in the title of the act, the legislature has inadvertently failed in its purpose to provide a special remedy for the enforcement of the lien and the collection of the debt. In that event the lien might be enforced and the debt collected by the ordinary process, by an action at law for the collection of the debt. If the legislature has failed, either intentionally or by inadvertence, to provide a special remedy for the enforcement of a lien which it has created, it does not follow that the statute creating the lien is without effect. As was said in Pollard v. Bailey, 20 Wall. 520, 22 L. ed. 376, a liability created by statute without a special remedy may be enforced by an appropriate common-law action, although, where the provision for the liability is coupled with a provision for a special remedy, that remedy—and that alone—must be employed. We see no reason for deciding now whether the municipality must eventually resort to the ordinary process or may employ the special remedy which the legislature has attempted to grant for the enforcement of the lien imposed upon the plaintiff's property. It is sufficient to say that the provisions of the statute that authorized the municipality to create the lien are valid, whether the remedy provided for enforcing the lien is or is not valid legislation. The only question with which the plaintiff is now concerned is whether the municipality had a right to impose the debt and lien upon his property. Our opinion is that the municipality had the right. Ubi jus ibi remedium. What the remedy is will be determined when the question arises.

We will amend the judgment appealed from in so far as it holds that §§ 7 and 8 of Act No. 249 of 1912 are constitutional, by making it a judgment of nonsuit against the plaintiff on that issue. In other respects the judgment is correct.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed, except in so far as it holds that §§ 7 and 8 of Act No. 249 of 1912 are constitutional, and on that issue the judgment is made one of nonsuit against the plaintiff. The plaintiff is to pay the costs of the District Court and the defendants the costs of appeal.

Provosty, J., dissenting:

Act 249, p. 553, of 1912, is designed to authorize municipalities to compel property owners to install sanitary closets connected with the municipal sewerage and water system. In this case, an ordinance of the city of Crowley under this act is enjoined, on the ground that the act is unconstitutional, in that it authorizes the city to invade the premises of the property owner for installing the closets, and compels him to buy the furnishings from the city, and in that §§ 7 and 8 of the act, which prescribe the mode of enforcing payment of the cost of said work, are void because not covered by the title of the act, and that thereby the entire act is made void, since it is thereby bereft of all means of enforcement.

The act empowers the municipality to have the work done only after the owner himself has failed to do it after due notification. We think the right of the public through the legislature and the local government to compel the instalment of sanitary closets connected with the municipal sewerage and water systems can hardly be doubted in this day of awakened public sentiment on the subject of sanitation. 28 Cyc. 919; Com. v. Roberts, 155 Mass. 281, 16 L.R.A. 400, 29 N. E. 522. And if the owner will not do it himself after due notification, there is nothing left but for the municipality to have it done at his expense. And necessarily it can be done only by providing the furnishings and going on the premises to install them.

That such installation and connection may be compelled under the police power, the learned counsel for plaintiff concedes; but he holds that the compulsion can only be by fine and imprisonment, not by having the work done and charging the cost. We have no doubt observance of such an ordinance might well be enforced by fine and imprisonment, under proper legislative authority; but, suppose the recalcitrant householder will pay fines and go to jail rather than make the installation, is the municipality in the meantime to remain subject to contagion from his unsanitary closet? To do the work for him if he will not do it is evidently the more certain, direct, sensible, and practical way.

However, if a special mode of proceeding is desired to be provided for enforcing payment of the cost of the work, that purpose must be expressed in the title of the statute that seeks to so provide; for otherwise the constitutional requirement that every act express its object in its title is not complied with. Now, the title of said Act 249 expresses the intention of empowering the municipalities "to levy costs thereof under special assessment carrying with it a lien and privilege upon property improved," but it says absolutely nothing on the point of how, or by what means, this special assessment shall be enforced. The said §§ 7 and 8 provide that the mode of enforcement shall be the same as for ordinary taxes. The intention to provide this special mode of proceeding is not expressed in the title of the act, and that therefore these §§ 7 and 8 are void.

The invalidity of part of a statute does not necessarily entail the invalidity of the whole, but it does, if the valid part is "ineffective and unenforceable" without the invalid part. 36 Cyc. 978. The learned counsel for the city say that, failing this special mode of proceeding sought to be provided for by §§ 7 and 8, the municipality may resort to an ordinary suit.

It is true that the special statutory remedy is not in all cases exclusive; that sometimes when it turns out to be unavailable, either because of unconstitutionality or otherwise, the ordinary remedy may be resorted to. 1 C. J. 991. But "where a statute creates a new right and also provides a remedy for its enforcement, it is ordinarily held that such remedy is exclusive." 1 C. J. 989. In this case the right in question is a new right created by the statute. This rule is said to be "based merely upon a presumed prohibition of other remedies." Id. In this case such prohibition appears to me to result from the nature of the right in question; for the recourse in this case against the property of the householder seems to have been intended to be restricted to the property upon which the installation is made, and not to extend to his other property as it would in the case of an ordinary suit. And the restricting of the recourse in this manner to the property improved, and not extending it to the property of the owner generally, is in accordance with the principles which come into play in such cases. "The levy of an assessment to pay the costs of public improvements imposes no personal liability upon the owner of land assessed, unless such liability is created by express statutory provision, and there are cases holding that the legislature is without power to make a special assessment a personal liability." 28 Cyc. 1253. The work in question in this case is not a public improvement, within the meaning of the passage here quoted, but said Act 249 provides that the cost shall "be assessed" and be "borne by each property" and be a lien upon the property, and that "the amounts assessed shall be placed upon the tax roll . . . and be due and collectable like other taxes." The manifest intention is that the cost of the work upon each piece of property shall be borne by the property, and be enforced in rem against it, and not in personam against the owner. "As a general rule, a statute providing a specific method for the enforcement of assessments is held" to be exclusive. 28 Cyc. 1209.

The necessary conclusion is that the act as a whole is inoperative, and that consequently the ordinance passed under it has no foundation to stand on, and therefore has been properly enjoined. I, therefore, respectfully dissent.

Annotation—Power to compel connection of property with public sewer.

The general question of the right and duty to connect property with a drain or sewer is treated in a note to Fergus Falls v. Edison, 70 L.R.A. 238.

The rule is well established that the enactment of statutes and ordinances compelling owners to connect their property with public sewers is within the police power, and that the validity of such legislation will be sustained; at least unless under the particular circumstances it is plainly unreasonable or arbitrary. And the fact that the existing sanitary arrangements may have been made under legislative authority or compulsion does not apparently affect the application of the rule. The following cases support the doctrine that, under the police power, legislatures, or municipalities if properly authorized, may compel the making by property owners of sewer connections not plainly unreasonable or arbitrary: Hutchinson v. Valdosta (1913) 227 U. S. 303, 57 L. ed. 521, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 290 (set out infra); District of Columbia v. Brooke (1908) 214 U. S. 138, 53 L. ed. 941, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 560 (same); Allman v. Mobile (1909) 162 Ala. 226, 50 So. 238 (city ordinance enacted under statutory authority requiring owners of property abutting on a street on which a sewer is laid to connect all closets, etc., therewith); Spear v. Ward (1917) — Ala. —, 74 So. 27; State, Van Wagoner, Prosecutor, v. Patterson (1902) 67 N. J. L. 455, 51 Atl. 922; Com. v. Roberts (1892) 155 Mass. 281, 16 L.R.A. 400, 29 N. E. 522 (sustaining the constitutionality of a statute providing that every building used as a dwelling and situated on a street in which there was a public sewer should have sufficient water-closets connected with the sewer); Com. v. Abbott (1894) 160 Mass. 282, 35 N. E. 782 (where the constitutionality of the statute considered in the last case was conceded, the question being whether the sewer was a public one, and it being held that if it was a public sewer below the premises in question, connection therewith might be required even if the laying out of that part above such premises was wrongful); Hill v. St. Louis (1900) 159 Mo. 159, 60 S. W. 116 (holding that the city may by ordinance require every water-closet or privy in use in any dwelling house within the city to be connected with an adjacent sewer); Mead v. Turner (1909) 134 App. Div. 691, 119 N. Y. Supp. 526 (statute authorizing village to require property owners to make connections with sewer); Lower Merron Twp. v. Becker (1910) 42 Pa. Super. Ct. 203 (upholding the validity of an ordinance, enacted under legislative authority, giving township commissioners power to establish a system of sewers and to require adjoining property owners to connect therewith when necessary for the public health and imposing a fine of $50 on any property owner abutting on a street in which a township sewer was laid who failed, after notice, to connect his property therewith, in the absence of a showing of abuse of discretion on the part of the commissioners); Harrington v. Providence (1897) 20 R. I. 233, 38 L.R.A. 305, 38 Atl. 1 (holding that notice and opportunity to be heard need not be given to a property owner before the passage of an ordinance under statutory authority requiring him to connect his drainage with the sewer and destroy any cesspool on the property); Case v. Board of Health (1913) 24 Philippine, 250 (upholding the validity of an ordinance requiring buildings or premises in the city to be connected with a new sewer system upon notice that the sewer into which such building or premises could drain was ready for service); Re McCutcheon (1863) 22 U. C. Q. B. 613.

In holding that the legislature might confer power on a municipality to compel owners of property abutting on a street in which a sewer was laid to make connections therewith, the court, in Allman v. Mobile (Ala.) supra, said: "No police power is more important than that to adopt such sanitary regulations as may be necessary to insure the safety and preserve the health of the inhabitants of a city. Nor do we doubt that the maintenance of an efficient sanitary sewerage system is of prime importance in encompassing the ends sought by the delegation of such power; and surely no sewerage system could be regarded as efficient without the incident of power in the municipal corporation to compel connections of property by its owners with the system. So, on principle and authority, we hold it to be within legislative competency to confer on municipal corporations the power to compel such connections."

And, it was held in Allman v. Mobile (1909) 162 Ala. 226, 50 So. 238, supra, that an ordinance providing that it should be the duty of the plumbing inspector, or of an authorized inspector acting under him, to order all persons owning property abutting on a street in which a sewer was laid to connect all closets, etc., therewith, and making it a misdemeanor for any person to refuse to make such connections after receiving notice to do so, was not invalid as an improper delegation of legislative power to an administrative officer, on the theory that the ordinance did not fix a duty on the property owner to make the connections, but only required those property owners to make the connection who were notified to do so. This contention, the court said, could not prevail for the reason that the ordinance left nothing to the discretion of the inspector, but imposed on him the imperative duty of ordering all persons of the class mentioned in the ordinance, namely, those owning property any part of which abutted on a street in which a sewer was laid, to connect all closets, etc., with the sewer.

And the doctrine of presumption of the validity of statutes and ordinances enacted to compel sewer connections, as well as the reasons for sustaining the right to compel such connections, are well stated in the recent case of Spear v. Ward (1917) — Ala. —, 74 So. 27, as follows: "The preservation of the public health by the installation and maintenance of sanitary systems of sewers and closets is well recognized as one of the most important duties of municipal governments, and falls clearly within the police powers of government, subject to which the inhabitant and citizen of the municipality holds his individual rights to property and to liberty. Consequently, statutes and ordinances dealing with and relating to such subjects, together with provisions for the enforcement thereof, will be indulged by the courts, with the presumptions in their favor, as to their necessity, propriety, and validity, in the absence of a showing to the effect that they are unreasonable, arbitrary, unduly oppressive, or inconsistent with the legislative policy of the state. . . . As before stated one of the most important objects of municipal government is the preservation of the public health; and science has demonstrated that nothing contributes more to secure the end than a sanitary system of sewerage and water-closets connected therewith; and the benefits of such a system are largely lost unless the inhabitants of the city can be compelled to connect their premises with the system, and to abandon dry closets and install water-closets. To this end the legislature has clothed municipalities with the power and authority to pass ordinances, by-laws, etc. The municipal authorities to this extent exercise the police power of the state; and they not only have the power, but the law enjoins the duty and obligation on them, to promptly abate or remove all nuisances by which the public health may be affected, and to thus provide for the safety, comfort, and convenience of the inhabitants. All the inhabitants, therefore, have an interest in seeing that proper ordinances are passed, as well as that, when passed, such ordinances are enforced against all, as the failure to conform thereto by a few may inflict injury and ill health upon the many. There are times when the public health is the object of paramount concern, and the law wisely lodges in municipal bodies discretion and power adequate to such emergencies."

In Branch v. Gerlach (1910) 94 Ark. 378, 127 S. W. 451, it was held that a city could by ordinance require a separate sewer connection for each lot, and that an owner of several houses on different lots in the same block could not compel the issuance of a permit for a single sewer connection for all the houses.

And under the Arkansas statute providing that property owners near or adjacent to a city sewer shall connect their premises therewith when required to do so by the board of health, it was held in Martin v. Hilb (1890) 53 Ark. 300, 14 S. W. 94, that one whose property was not within a sewer district might connect with the sewer when ordered to do so by the board of health, and was not required to pay any part of the cost of construction of the sewer before so doing.

An apparently extreme case supporting the right of a municipality to require property owners to make connections with a public sewer is that of Hutchinson v. Valdosta (1913) 227 U. S. 303, 57 L. ed. 520, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 290, in which it was held that an ordinance, adopted under legislative authority by an inland town of less than 6,000 inhabitants, by which the owners of property abutting on a street along which sewers had been laid were required to install water-closets in their houses, and connect the same with the sewer within thirty days from the passage of the ordinance, under penalty of fine and imprisonment for noncompliance, was a valid exercise of the police power, and did not, although affording no notice or opportunity to be heard, deny either due process of law or the equal protection of the laws. The court said: "According to the bill, the city is given the power, through its mayor and council, 'to enact such rules and regulations for the transaction of its business and for the welfare and proper government thereof,' as the mayor and council may deem best; and the bill shows that the courts of the state decided that the ordinance was within this delegation of power. It is the commonest exercise of the police power of a state or city to provide for a system of sewers, and to compel property owners to connect therewith. And this duty may be enforced by criminal penalties. District of Columbia v. Brooke (1908) 214 U. S. 138, 53 L. ed. 941, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 560. It may be L.R.A.1918C.

that an arbitrary exercise of the power could be restrained, but it would have to be palpably so to justify a court in interfering with so salutary a power and one so necessary to the public health. There is certainly nothing in the facts alleged in the bill to justify the conclusion that the city was induced by anything in the enactment of the ordinance other than the public good, or that such was not its effect."

In District of Columbia v. Brooke (U. S.) supra, which is cited in the quotation in the last case, the court sustained the validity of the Act of Congress of 1896, providing for the drainage of lots in the District of Columbia, and requiring connections with public sewers. The statute provided for the making of the connections, in case of nonresident owners, by the commissioners, and the assessment of the cost thereof as a tax against the property. And it was held that the owner could not urge against the validity of an assessment for connecting her property with the sewer that no showing was made that any nuisance existed on the property, or that the means of drainage already there were unsanitary or insufficient, or that any necessity existed for making the connections; neither could she, as an owner of property on which the buildings had been erected, challenge the validity of a provision in the statute which affected only owners of unimproved property. And it was held also that, assuming that Congress was forbidden to enact discriminating legislation, the statute was not rendered invalid for discrimination by the distinction between resident and nonresident owners of abutting property, in that the coercion of the law as to making connections with the sewer was by criminal punishment in the case of residents, whereas, against nonresidents, the district did the work in case of their neglect, and assessed the cost against the property as a tax.

The power to compel the making of connections with a new sewer system was held in Case v. Board of Health (1913) 24 Philippine, 250, to be conferred on the municipal authorities by charter provisions authorizing them to enact ordinances for the installation and maintenance of proper drainage of buildings and premises, to establish and maintain drains and sewers, to declare, prevent, and abate nuisances, and to provide for the "peace, order, safety, and general welfare of the city and its inhabitants."

However, in Philadelphia v. Provident Life & T. Co. (1890) 132 Pa. 224, 18 Atl. 1114, it was held that while the board of health of the city of Philadelphia had power to declare and abate nuisances, under which it could require privies to be cleaned and purified, it had exceeded its powers, so far as shown, in requiring also that the owner construct water-closets with proper sewer connections, although a statute authorized it to "remove the cause of all nuisances that now exist, or may hereafter be created."

And it was held in Gault v. Ft. Collins (1914) 57 Colo. 324, 142 Pac. 171, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 718, that the power to compel outside vaults or privies in a sewer district to be connected with the sewer, regardless of whether they were on vacant lots or were in use, was not conferred on a municipality by a statute giving city authorities the power to establish a sewerage system, and, for that purpose, to divide the city into sewer districts and compel the owners of buildings located in the districts and the owner of any building located on blocks abutting on any established sewer to connect with the sewer; and to prohibit the keeping or maintaining of any vault or privy within the sewer district or within a certain distance of any established sewer. It was held also that such power was not conferred by statutes giving boards of health in cities the power to make such rules and regulations in relation to the care and cleaning of privies as might be deemed desirable for the preservation of health, or to declare a privy a nuisance and abate the same, or to compel the owner to cleanse or remove it.

In State, Van Wagoner, Prosecutor, v. Paterson (1902) 67 N. J. L. 455, 51 Atl. 922, it was held that a city might be authorized by statute, when building a sewer, to construct necessary house connections from the sewer to the curb line of the lots, and charge the costs and expenses thereof to the lot owners, on the ground that a requirement for a sewer connection with a dwelling on premises abutting on a sewer is within the power of the local authorities under the sanitation and health laws, and that this requirement may be anticipated for municipal convenience, and as a necessary police regulation, at the time the sewer is constructed.

fact that a sewer was constructed with house connections extending from the sewer to a point 12 inches beyond the curb line did not render it a private instead of a public improvement, and that the cost of the improvement, including the house connections, could be assessed on the property benefited. But in Corde-man v. Cincinnati (1872) 23 Ohio St. 499, it was held, on grounds beyond the scope of the note, that a contract by a city for the making of "house connections" at the time the sewer was built was without authority of law and unenforceable. The note does not purport to cover this class of cases.

The power to compel connections with public sewers seems to be assumed in Toney v. Macon (1903) 119 Ga. 83, 46 S. E. 80, in which it was held that a statute extending the limits of a certain city could not be declared void as a whole because the penalty for not making sewer connections in the new territory was by fine and imprisonment, while under existing ordinances in the old limits the punishment was by fine only. A writ of error in this case was dismissed for want of jurisdiction in (1904) 195 U. S. 625, 49 L. ed. 350, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 791.

The opinion in Tenement House Dept. of New York v. Moeschen (1904) 179 N. Y. 325, 70 L.R.A. 704, 103 Am. St. Rep. 910, 72 N. E. 231, 1 Ann. Cas. 439, affirmed without opinion in (1906) 203 U. S. 583, 51 L. ed. 328, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 781, will be found helpful in this connection, although the case goes beyond the scope of the present note, and unholds the validity of a statute requiring the substitution of water-closets for school sinks.

The English cases on the question of compelling connections with drains and sewers seem to be of little general value as precedents, because of the controlling effect of the local statutes, and no attempt is here made to collect these cases. It may be worth while to observe, however, that the power to compel such connections seems in that country to be well established. It is said in 25 Halsbury's Law of England, pp. 750 et seq., that "where any house within the district of a local authority is without a drain sufficient for effectual drainage, the local authority must by written notice require the owner or occupier of such house within a reasonable time therein specified, to make a covered drain or drains emptying into any sewer which the authority is entitled to use, and which is not more than 100 feet from the site of such house, or if no such means of drainage are within that distance, then emptying into such covered cesspool or other place not being under any house as the local authority directs. . . . If such notice is not complied with within the specified time, the local authority may do the work by agreement with the owner, or may do the work required, and recover the expenses incurred by it in so doing from the owner summarily, or may by order declare them to be private improvement expenses. . . . The provisions in the Metropolis as to draining houses into sewers are of a similar nature to, but different in form from, those in the rest of the country."

Cases such as Ginter v. St. Mark's Church (1905) 95 Minn. 14, 69 L.R.A. 621, 111 Am. St. Rep. 438, 103 N. W.

738, on the question of the duty generally of a property owner, apart from express statute or ordinance, to connect water gutters on his buildings with a sewer on an adjoining street, so as to prevent the collection of rain water and its discharge upon adjoining property, are not covered in the note.

And the note does not, of course, purport to include such cases as Slaughter v. O'Berry (1900) 126 N. C. 181, 48 L.R.A. 442, 35 S. E. 241, where no affirmative duty to make the connection was imposed, but a statute or ordinance provided for connection only on certain conditions, among which were in this case that the city should do the work and furnish the materials for making the sewer connections up to within 3 feet of the building to be connected.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF LOUISIANA, Appt.,

v.

LOUIS McCORMICK.

(— La. —, 77 So. 288.)

Constitutional law — police power — control.

1. The legitimate exercise of the police power is not subject to restraint by constitutional provisions for the general protection of individual rights of life, liberty, and property; nor does the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States interfere with such exercise of that power.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, II. c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — penalizing association with prostitutes.

2. A statute penalizing as vagrants "male persons who habitually associate with prostitutes and who habitually loiter in or around houses of prostitution" is a competent exercise of the police power.

tion to quash an indictment charging him with vagrancy. Judgment set aside.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. V. Coco, Attorney General, Fred M. Odom, and Vernon A. Coco, for appellant:

The state, in the exercise of its police power, has the right to legislate against vagrancy.

Ex parte Strittmatter, 58 Tex. Crim. Rep. 156, 137 Am. St. Rep. 937, 124 S. W. 906, 21 Ann. Cas. 477; Ex parte McCarthy, 72 Cal. 384, 14 Pac. 96; People v. Craig, 152 Cal. 42, 91 Pac. 997; State v. Preston, 4 Idaho, 215, 38 Pac. 694, 9 Am. Crim. Rep. 735; Ex parte Hayden, 12 Cal. App. 145, 106 Pac. 893.

Mr. Harry H. Russell, for appellee:

An act forbidding association with prostitutes or loitering around a house of prostitution is an unconstitutional invasion of personal liberty.

Ex parte Smith, 135 Mo. 223, 33 L.R.A. 606, 58 Am. St. Rep. 576, 36 S. W. 628; St. Louis v. Roche, 125 Mo. 541, 31 S. W. 915.

To bring such association or such loitering within the proper control of the state, under the guise of police regulation, there must be committed some act, or there must enter some element, in itself such an act or such an element as to vest the state with control under its police power.

8 Cyc. 864-871, 886, 1087; St. Louis v. Fitz, 53 Mo. 582.

Monroe Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant was prosecuted under an indictment which reads in part: "That Louis McCormick . . . from January 1 . . .

to March 23, 1917, . . . in the parish and state aforesaid, being . . . a male person, did, . . . wilfully and feloniously, habitually associate with prostitutes and habitually loiter in or around a house of prostitution, in violation of Act- 226 of . . . 1912," etc.

The statute thus mentioned is entitled, "An Act to Define and Punish Vagrancy and to Provide Penalties for The Violation Hereof," and it declares: "Section 1. . . . That any male person who habitually associates with prostitutes, or who habitually loiters in or around houses of prostitution, or who, being without visible means of support, lives with a prostitute, shall be deemed guilty of vagrancy."

Defendant moved to quash the indictment on the ground that the statute quoted, in so far as here applicable, is unconstitutional, in that it attempts to abridge, deny, or impair the rights, privileges, and immunities of the citizen, and invade those rights of personal liberty which are guaranteed to him by articles 1, 2, and 15 of the Constitution of the state, and the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The trial judge sustained that view and quashed the indictment, and the state has appealed.

The articles of the state Constitution which are relied on declare that government originates with the people, is founded on their will alone, and is instituted solely for the good of the whole; that its only legitimate end is to secure justice to all, preserve peace, and promote the interest and happiness of the people; that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property except by due process of law; and the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States declares that all persons born or naturalized in the United States are citizens thereof and of the state in which they reside; that no state shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, or deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws.

"The legitimate exercise of the police power is not subject to restraint by constitutional provisions for the general protection of rights of individual life, liberty, and property." State v. Schlemmer, 42 La. Ann. 1166, 10 L.R.A. 135, 8 So. 307. And the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States does not interfere with the proper exercise of that power. 6 R. C. L. ¶ 193, 194; L'Hote v. New Orleans, 177 U. S. 596, 44 L. ed. 903, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 788.

thorities, "to render a satisfactory definition of 'police power,' there seems to be no doubt that it extends to the protection of the lives, health, and property of the citizens, and to the preservation of good order and the public morals." 6 R. C. L. ¶ 199.

"This power also clearly extends to the regulation or suppression of houses of prostitution," etc. Id. ¶ 201.

If, in the interest of the public health, the state may establish hospitals for the segregation of persons affected with leprosy, smallpox, and other infectious diseases, it would hardly be contended that it could not make such measures effective by excluding therefrom, under penalty, persons likely to contract and communicate those diseases. If it may, in the interest of the public morals and health, regulate or suppress houses of prostitution, why may it not, as a means of regulation, or partial regulation, prohibit "male persons" from associating with the prostitutes and loitering in or about such houses? In L'Hote v. New Orleans, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Mr. Justice Brewer, and dealing with the interests not of the associates of the prostitutes and loiterers about their houses, but with the rights of a citizen whose property was injuriously affected by the establishment of a "restricted district" in its vicinity, said: "Obviously the regulation of houses of ill fame, legislation in respect to women of loose character, may involve one of three possibilities: First, absolute prohibition; second, full freedom in respect to place; . . . or third, a restriction of the location of such houses to certain defined limits. Whatever course of conduct the legislature may adopt is, in a general way, conclusive upon all courts, state and Federal. It is no part of the judicial function to determine the wisdom or folly of a regulation by the legislative body in respect to matters of a police nature."

There are other decisions of the same august tribunal, and of the other courts of the country, to the effect that the aid of the judiciary may be invoked to protect rights guaranteed by Constitutions from the arbitrary abuse of the police power, but the principle remains that the legitimate exercise of that power is a function of the legislative department, with the discharge of which the judiciary has no mission to interfere, and, as we are of opinion that in the present instance the power has been legitimately and properly exercised, we conclude that the statute complained of should be sustained.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment appealed from be set aside, the indictment reinstated, and the case remanded to be proceeded with according to law and to the views hereinabove expressed.

Leche, J., takes no part.

(N.S.) 113, 95 N. E. 751.

Loring, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

While staying with the defendant as her guest the plaintiff, at the defendant's invitation, went out with the defendant in her motor car. The car was driven by a chauffeur furnished by the owner of the garage where it was kept. Through the negligence of the chauffeur the machine was overturned and fell on the plaintiff causing the injuries here complained of. The jury found that while driving the machine the chauffeur acted as the defendant's servant, and this finding was warranted by the evidence. They also found that the accident was caused by the negligence of the chauffeur. Upon the jury making these findings the judge directed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant and reported the case to this court.

"At the trial the plaintiff did not claim that the jury could find from the evidence gross negligence on the part of the defendant." There was no question of negligence on the part of anyone but the defendant's chauffeur, and the plaintiff has not contended that there was. We therefore construe her concession to be a concession that she did not make out a case of gross negligence on the part of the chauffeur.

It was decided in West v. Poor, 196 Mass. 183, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 936, 124 Am. St. Rep. 541, 81 N. E. 960, that a defendant who invites a plaintiff to ride gratis in his carriage is liable to the same extent that a gratuitous bailee is liable. In West v. Poor, a milkman, on returning to his wagon after delivering some milk, found in it the plaintiff and some other children. He did not order them out of the wagon, but drove on. When the defendant stopped to make the next delivery, the plaintiff with the defendant's assistance undertook to get out of the wagon, and while she was in the act of getting out the horse started; the plaintiff was thrown to the ground and suffered the injuries complained of in that action. That case was disposed of by this court in these words: "He [the defendant] did nothing and said nothing to invite them; and the nearest analogy that occurs to us is that of a self-invited guest in whose presence the host acquiesces and whose enjoyment he seeks to promote, or that of a gratuitous bailee. In the former case the degree of care required is that of licensor and licensee (Plummer v. Dill, 156 Mass. 426, 32 Am. St. Rep. 463, 31 N. E. 128; Hart v. Cole, 156 Mass. 475, 16 L.R.A. 557, 31 N. E. 644), which, as has often been said, requires only that the licensor shall not set traps for the licensee, and shall refrain from reckless, wilful or wanton misconduct tending to injure him (Massell v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 191 Mass. 491, 78 N. E. 108). In the latter case, in order to render the bailee liable, it must appear that he has been guilty of culpable negligence. Whitney v. Lee, 8 Met. 91, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 789; Nolton v. Western R. Co. 15 N. Y. 444, 69 Am. Dec. 623."

The liability "of a gratuitous bailee" was described by Chief Justice Shaw in the case of Whitney v. Lee, cited above, in these words: "Subject to these remarks upon the application of these distinctions [as to different degrees of negligence], we think it well settled, that a bailee for safe-keeping, without reward, is not responsible for the article deposited, without proof that the loss was occasioned by bad faith or gross negligence. This rule was settled, on great consideration and after full deliberation, in Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 479, 9 Am. Dec. 168, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 502; and this supersedes the necessity of any full review of the authorities."

The plaintiff in effect asks us to overrule West v. Poor so far as the second ground goes on which that case was decided. In that connection she has relied upon Patnode v. Foote, 153 App. Div. 494, 138 N. Y. Supp. 221; Pigeon v. Lane, 80 Conn. 237, 67 Atl. 886, 11 Ann. Cas. 371; and Beard v. Klusmeier, 158 Ky. 153, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1100, 164 S. W. 319, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 342. In addition to these cases relied upon by the plaintiff, there are cases to the same effect not cited by her, which ought to be considered in connection with them. We take them up in their order. The first of these cases in point of time is Mayberry v. Sivey, 18 Kan. 291. That case was decided on the authority of this statement of Wharton in his textbook on Negligence: "A person who undertakes to do a service for another is liable to such other person for want of due care and attention . . . in the performance of the service, even though there is no consideration for such undertaking. . . . The confidence accepted is an adequate consideration to support the duty." [§ 355.]

But Mr. Wharton is of opinion that in the common law of England there are no degrees of negligence. This conclusion is based on Mr. Wharton's contention that the opinion of Chief Justice Holt in Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909, 92 Eng. Reprint, 107, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 370, 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 247, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 948, so far as it made a distinction between gross and ordinary negligence, was based on a misapprehension as to the rule of the civil law. See Wharton, Neg. 2d. ed. §§ 482-510. Whether different degrees of negligence are known to the common law is a question to be considered by itself and taken up later on.

The next case in point of time, and the most important of all these cases, is Pigeon v. Lane, 80 Conn. 237, 67 Atl. 886, 11 Ann. Cas. 371. In that case the defendants had sent a sleigh in charge of their servant Rinski by name, to bring their employees to their work, and there was evidence that the plaintiff was injured by Rinski's negligence. The presiding judge instructed the jury that it was immaterial whether the defendants were bound to send the sleigh to bring the plaintiff to his work, or had sent the sleigh gratuitously; that in either case Rinski was the fellow servant of the plaintiff and the defendants were not liable. The supreme court of errors of Connecticut decided that, if the defendants sent Rinski gratuitously, he was not the plaintiff's fellow servant and for that reason the appeal was well taken. After that point had been decided this was added (80 Conn. at page 241): "Although, if the plaintiff was injured while riding upon the sleigh as a mere licensee, the defendants could be held liable only for their active negligence in causing the injury,—which would include their own or their servant Rinski's negligent acts, by which the danger of riding upon the conveyance was increased; or a new danger created, while the plaintiff was riding under such license (Pomponio v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 66 Conn. 528, 538, 32 L.R.A. 530, 50 Am. St. Rep. 124, 34 Atl. 491),—the allegation that the injury was caused by the careless, negligent, and improper driving of the conveyance by the defendants' servant, in such a manner that it collided with the bridge, is a sufficient averment to permit proof of that negligence which would render the defendants liable as licensors."

Pomponio v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 66 Conn. 528, 32 L.R.A. 530, 50 Am. St. Rep. 124, 34 Atl. 491 (on the authority of which this statement in Pigeon v. Lane is founded), was a case where, on the findings made, the plaintiff was crossing the defendant's track for his own convenience at a place planked as a crossing, but where neither the plaintiff nor the public had a right to cross, and was injured by the negligence of the defendant in the operation of one of its trains. It was held that, while the plaintiff, being on the defendant's premises for his own convenience, was a licensee, and therefore took the defendant's premises as he found them (in the absence of a trap), the defendant was liable for injuries suffered by the plaintiff by reason of active negligence in the operation of its trains. Pomponio v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. was decided on the authority of Corrigan v. Union Sugar Refinery, 98 Mass. 577, 96 Am. Dec. 685. That was a case in which the plaintiff was proceeding as a licensee along an alleyway on the premises of the defendant and was injured by the negligence of the defendant's servants in throwing down beer barrels into the alleyway. In Pomponio v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. ubi supra, the court quotes a reference of this court in Stevens v. Nichols, 155 Mass. 472, 475, 15 L.R.A. 459, 29 N. E. 1150, to the doctrine of Corrigan v. Union Sugar Refinery, which L.R.A.1918C.

was in these words: "The licensor has, however, no right to create a new danger while the license continues. Oliver v. Worcester, 102 Mass. 489, 502, 3 Am. Rep. 485; Corrigan v. Union Sugar Refinery, supra; Corby v. Hill, 4 C. B. N. S. 556, 140 Eng. Reprint, 1209, 27 L. J. C. P. N. S. 318, 4 Jur. N. S. 512, 6 Week. Rep. 575. So a railroad company which allows the public habitually to use a private crossing of its tracks cannot use active force against a person or vehicle crossing under a license, express or implied."

It is not necessary to consider whether this reference in Stevens v. Nichols to the doctrine of Corrigan v. Union Sugar Refinery is or is not a sufficiently careful statement of that doctrine to determine the reason on which it is founded or the limitations to which it is subject. The rule of Corrigan v. Union Sugar Refinery is a rule as to the liability of a licensor to a licensee. But where a defendant invites a plaintiff to ride gratis in his carriage, the question is not a question of the measure of liability of a licensor to a licensee. It is the question of the measure of the liability assumed in case of a gratuitous undertaking. For this reason the doctrine of Pomponio v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. and of Corrigan v. Union Sugar Refinery (the case on which Pomponio v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. was decided) is not applicable in the case at bar, where the defendant invited the plaintiff to ride gratis in her carriage.

The next case in point of time is Patnode v. Foote, 153 App. Div. 494, 138 N. Y. Supp. 221. In that case it was said that no decision upon the point had been found in New York, but that the case of Pigeon v. Lane in Connecticut "impresses us as stating the true rule." Without further discussion the court followed the opinion in Pigeon v. Lane. Adams v. Tozer, 163 App. Div. 751, 149 N. Y. Supp. 163 (the next case), was decided on the authority of Patnode v. Foote and of Grimshaw v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 205 N. Y. 371, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 563, 98 N. E. 762, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 571. The latter was a case where the plaintiff, being by license of the Wabash Railroad Company on an engine of that company, was injured in a collision at a grade crossing of the rails of the Wabash and of the defendant railroad company, caused by the negligence of those operating the defendant's engine. It was held that the defendant owed the plaintiff the duty of exercising due care not to injure him since he was lawfully on the Wabash engine, and that it was immaterial that he was lawfully there by license, and not by compensation paid by him to the Wabash Railroad Company. In other words the point decided in Grimshaw v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. ubi supra, is that decided in Boutlier v. Malden, 226 Mass. 479, 116 N. E. 251. It has no bearing upon the liability of a defendant who invites a plaintiff to ride gratis in his carriage. There is another case in New York (referred to in one of the cases to be considered later on), namely, Birch v. New York, 190 N. Y. 397, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 595, 83 N. E. 51. The point decided in that case was that a licensee entering on the wharf of a licensor takes the property as he finds it. In making that decision the court said obiter that the owner of land is liable to one entering upon it as licensee for active negligence on its part; that is to say, it was liable in a case like Corrigan v. Union Sugar Refinery. The next case in point of time is Lochhead v. Jensen, 42 Utah, 99, 129 Pac. 347. In that case a verdict was set aside on the ground that the plaintiff was allowed at the trial to recover for an injury not alleged in the complaint. After setting aside the verdict on that ground, the court (42 Utah at page 104) said, with respect to a new trial, that there was nothing in the defendant's contention "that 'the ride in the automobile was the mutual enjoyment of all three' occupants, and since the plaintiff did not show that the deceased protested against the manner of its operation, it must be presumed that he acquiesced therein; and therefore the negligence, if any, of the defendant, must be imputed to the deceased."

There was nothing else in the case which bears or might be thought to bear upon the question which we have under consideration. The next case in point of time is Beard v. Klusmeier, 158 Ky. 153, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1100, 164 S. W. 319, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 342. That case was decided without discussion on the authority of Lochhead v. Jensen and Patnode v. Foote. The next is Fitzjarrell v. Boyd, 123 Md. 497, 91 Atl. 547. That case was decided on the authority of Huddy, Automobiles, § 113; Patnode v. Foote; Beard v. Klusmeier; Pigeon v. Lane; Birch v. New York; Mayberry v. Sivey, and Lochhead v. Jensen. After citing these authorities the court said (123 Md. at page 505): "The rule announced in these cases, we think, is the true and correct rule, and is controlling on this appeal."

There was no further discussion of the principles involved or of other decisions. It is apparent from this review of the decisions in conflict with West v. Poor that the question whether they are or are not correct depends upon the question whether degrees of negligence are known to the L.R.A.1918C.

common law, and whether the rule of Corrigan v. Union Sugar Refinery governs the liability of a defendant who invites a plaintiff to ride gratis in his carriage. Apart from the question whether degrees in negligence are a thing known to the common law (which was in reality what was decided in the negative in Mayberry v. Sivey, 18 Kan. 291), we are of opinion that these cases are not well decided and that they should not be followed.

Mr. Wharton is not alone in the conclusion reached by him that no such a thing as different degrees in negligence is known to the common law. It was said by Lord Cranworth (then Baron Rolfe) in Wilson v. Brett, 11 Mees. & W. 113, 115, 116, 152 Eng. Reprint, 737, that "I said I could see no difference between negligence and gross negligence,—that it was the same thing, with the addition of a vituperative epithet."

In Beal v. South Devon R. Co. 3 Hurlst. & C. 337, 341, 159 Eng. Reprint, 560, 11 L. T. N. S. 184, 12 Week. Rep. 1115, 18 Eng. Rul. Cas. 643, Crompton, J., in delivering the judgment of the exchequer chamber, said that it was a mistake to say that there was no difference between ordinary and gross negligence "because a strict line of demarcation cannot be drawn between them." And in Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. L. R. 1 C. P. 600, 4 Eng. Rul. Cas. 680, both Willes, J., and Montague Smith, J., expressed their dissatisfaction with the term "gross negligence." Willes, J., went so far as to say, at page 612: "No information, however, has been given us as to the meaning to be attached to 'gross negligence' in this case: and I quite agree with the dictum of Lord Cranworth in Wilson v. Brett, that gross negligence is ordinary negligence with a vituperative epithet,—a view held by the exchequer chamber. Beal v. South Devon R. Co. 3 Hurlst. & C. 337, 159 Eng. Reprint, 560, 11 L. T. N. S. 184, 12 Week. Rep. 1115, 18 Eng. Rul. Cas. 643. Confusion has arisen from regarding negligence as a positive instead of a negative word."

But it is probable that an end was put in England to these objections to the term "gross negligence," by the decisions of the privy council in Giblin v. McMullen, L. R. 2 P. C. 317, 5 Moore, P. C. C. N. S. 434, 16 Eng. Reprint, 578, 38 L. J. P. C. N. S. 25, 21 L. T. N. S. 214, 17 Week. Rep. 445, the judgments of which, while not binding on the high court, are "entitled to very great weight indeed." Dulieu v. White [1901] 2 K. B. 669, at 677, 70 L. J. K. B. N. S. 837, 50 Week. Rep. 76, 85 L. T. N. S. 186, 17 Times L. R. 555. That was a case in its dramatic as well as in its legal aspects like Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass.

479, 9 Am. Dec. 168, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 502, and it was largely upon the authority of the decision in Foster v. Essex Bank that Giblin v. McMullen was decided. In delivering the judgment of the privy council in Giblin v. McMullen, Lord Chelmsford said, at pages 336, 337: "From the time of Lord Holt's celebrated judgment in Coggs v. Bernard, in which he classified and distinguished the different degrees of negligence for which the different kinds of bailees are answerable, the negligence which must be established against a gratuitous bailee has been called 'gross negligence.'"

After referring to Lord Cranworth's observation in Wilson v. Brett, and to the fact that "this critical observation has been since approved of by other eminent judges," he said: "Of course, if intended as a definition, the expression 'gross negligence' wholly fails of its object. But as there is a practical difference between the degrees of negligence for which different classes of bailees are responsible, the term may be usefully retained as descriptive of that difference. . . . No advantage would be gained by substituting a positive for a negative phrase, because the degree of care and diligence which a bailee must exercise corresponds with the degree of negligence for which he is responsible, and there would be the same difficulty in defining the extent of the positive duty in each case as the degree of neglect of it which incurs responsibility. In truth, this difficulty is inherent in the nature of the subject, and though degrees of care are not definable, they are with some approach to certainty distinguishable."

Giblin v. McMullen, ubi supra, established the rule laid down by Chief Justice Holt in Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909, 913, 92 Eng. Reprint, 107, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 370, 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 247, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 948, that, to charge a defendant in case of gratuitous bailment, the plaintiff must prove gross negligence; and that rule has been applied in the only cases of gratuitous undertakings which have arisen in England since then. In Moffatt v. Bateman, L. R. 3 P. C. 115, 22 L. T. N. S. 140, 6 Moore, P. C. C. N. S. 369, 16 Eng. Reprint, 765, the question to be decided in the case at bar was before the court. It was held by the privy council that, in case of an invitation to ride gratis in the defendant's carriage, to make out liability, the plaintiff had to prove gross negligence. And in Coughlin v. Gillison [1899] 1 Q. B. 145, 68 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 147, 47 Week. Rep. 113, 79 L. T. N. S. 627, it was decided that, in the case of a gratuitous lending of an engine for the sole benefit of the borrower, the borrower, to make out liability, had to prove a gross neglect on the part of the lender. In all three of these cases the decision was that the plaintiff took nothing because he had failed to make out gross negligence.

In Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby, 14 How. 468, 485, 486, 14 L. ed. 502, 509, 510, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 602, Grier, J., said: "It is true, a distinction has been taken in some cases, between simple negligence and great or gross negligence; and it is said that one who acts gratuitously is liable only for the latter. But this case does not call upon us to define the difference (if it be capable of definition), as the verdict has found this to be a case of gross negligence. When carriers undertake to convey persons by the powerful but dangerous agency of steam, public policy and safety require that they be held to the greatest possible care and diligence. And whether the consideration for such transportation be pecuniary or otherwise, the personal safety of the passengers should not be left to the sport of chance or the negligence of careless agents. Any negligence in such cases may well deserve the epithet of 'gross.'"

In The New World v. King, 16 How. 469, 474, 14 L. ed. 1019, 1021, Curtis, J. (after pointing out that the appellee was lawfully upon the steamboat of the plaintiff), said that it was not necessary to decide whether "precisely the same obligations in all respects" attached in that case as in case of an ordinary passenger paying fare. He then referred to the statement of Grier, J., in Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby, 14 How. 468, 14 L. ed. 502, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 602, which we have just quoted, and he added: "We desire to be understood to reaffirm that doctrine." In addition he said: "The theory that there are three degrees of negligence, described by the terms slight, ordinary, and gross, has been introduced into the common law from some of the commentators on the Roman law. It may be doubted if these terms can be usefully applied in practice."

He then refers, among other cases, to Wilson v. Brett, 11 Mees. & W. 113, 152 Eng. Reprint, 737, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 264, and adds: "Some of the ablest commentators on the Roman law and on the Civil Code of France have wholly repudiated this theory of three degrees of negligence." See also in this connection Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489, 493-495, 23 L. ed. 374, 376; Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291, 295, 296, 23 L. ed. 898, 899, 900, 7 Am. Neg. Cas. 331; Northern P. R. Co. v. Adams, 192 U. S. 440, 48 L. ed. 513, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 408.

But in the case of New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 382, 383, 21 L. ed. 627, 641, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 624, Bradley, J., said: "We have already adverted to the tendency of judicial opinion adverse to the distinction between gross and ordinary negligence. Strictly speaking, these expressions are indicative rather of the degree of care and diligence which is due from a party and which he fails to perform, than of the amount of inattention, carelessness, or stupidity which he exhibits. If very little care is due from him, and he fails to bestow that little, it is called gross negligence. If very great care is due, and he fails to come up to the mark required, it is called slight negligence. And if ordinary care is due, such as a prudent man would exercise in his own affairs, failure to bestow that amount of care is called ordinary negligence. In each case, the negligence, whatever epithet we give it, is failure to bestow the care and skill which the situation demands; and hence it is more strictly accurate perhaps to call it simply 'negligence.' And this seems to be the tendency of modern authorities. If they mean more than this, and seek to abolish the distinction of degrees of care, skill, and diligence required in the performance of various duties and the fulfilment of various contracts, we think they go too far; since the requirement of different degrees of care in different situations is too firmly settled and fixed in the law to be ignored or changed. The compilers of the French Civil Code undertook to abolish these distinctions by enacting that 'every act whatever of man that causes damage to another obliges him by whose fault it happened to repair it.' Toullier, in his Commentary on the Code, regards this as a happy thought, and a return to the law of nature. But such an iron rule is too regardless of the foundation principles of human duty, and must often operate with great severity and injustice."

The last word of importance upon this point to be found in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States is in Preston v. Prather, 137 U. S. 604, 34 L. ed. 788, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 162, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 599. In that case the rule of Foster v. Essex Bank was repudiated. In that case Field, J., said (137 U. S. 608, 609): "No one taking upon himself a duty for another without consideration is bound, either in law or morals, to do more than a man of that character would do generally for himself under like conditions. The exercise of reasonable care is in all such cases the dictate of good faith. . . . But what will constitute such reasonable care will vary with the nature, value, and situation of the property, the general protection afforded by the police of the community against violence and crime, and the bearing of surrounding circumstances upon its security. . . . The general doctrine, as stated by text-writers and in judicial decisions, is that gratuitous bailees of another's property are not responsible for its loss unless guilty of gross negligence in its keeping. But gross negligence in such cases is nothing more than a failure to bestow the care which the property in its situation demands; the omission of the reasonable care required is the negligence which creates the liability; and whether this existed is a question of fact for the jury to determine, or by the court where a jury is waived. See The New World v. King, 16 How. 469, 474, 475, 14 L. ed. 1019, 1021, 1022, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 614; New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 383, 21 L. ed. 627, 641, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 624; Milwaukee & St. Paul R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489, 494, 23 L. ed. 374, 376."

In this commonwealth the judges seem to have had little, if any, difficulty in recognizing degrees of negligence in case of gratuitous bailments, but to have had Lord Cranworth's difficulty (or rather the difficulty which those who followed Lord Cranworth put in articulate form) in other cases. The remarks to which we referred, but did not set forth when we quoted the opinion of Chief Justice Shaw in Whitney v. Lee, 8 Met. 91, 93, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 789, were these: "The law has endeavored to make a distinction in the degrees of care and diligence to which different bailees are bound, distinguishing between gross negligence, ordinary negligence, and slight negligence; though it is often difficult to mark the line where the one ends and the other begins. And it must be often left to the jury, upon the nature of the subject-matter and the particular circumstances of each case, with suitable remarks by the judge, to say whether the particular case is within the one or the other."

In the later case of Chandler v. Worcester Mut. F. Ins. Co. 3 Cush. 328, Chief Justice Shaw was more pronounced in his views as to degrees of negligence. That was a case in which the defendant set up in defense to a claim on a fire insurance policy the fact that the fire had taken place through the gross neglect of the insured. After deciding that to make out the defense relied upon, the insurance company had to "show a culpable recklessness and indifference to the rights of others," Chief Justice Shaw added, at page 331: "The terms 'slight negligence,' 'want of ordinary care,' and 'gross negligence' are useful in their way, but they are not precise and exact enough, without a statement of the facts designated by them, to enable a court to judge of the rights of parties thereby affected. The proper business of jurisprudence seems to be to take a series of facts and circumstances conceded or proved, and to declare what are the rights of the parties arising out of them."

In Smith v. First Nat. Bank, 99 Mass. 605, 97 Am. Dec. 59, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 523 (a case of gratuitous bailment), Wells, J., ends the opinion (99 Mass. at page 612) in these words: "But the court are of opinion that the whole testimony did not furnish such evidence as would warrant a jury in finding that there was gross negligence on the part of the bank, and that the loss of the bonds resulted from such negligence. Giblin v. McMullen, L. R. 2 P. C. 317, 5 Moore, P. C. C. N. S. 434, 16 Eng. Reprint, 578, 38 L. J. P. C. N. S. 25, 21 L. T. N. S. 214, 17 Week Rep. 445. The exceptions must therefore be sustained upon that ground."

Gill v. Middleton, 105 Mass. 477, 7 Am. Rep. 548, was a case in which the defendant (the owner of the premises in question, then leased to the plaintiff's husband) had undertaken to repair them gratis. The presiding judge told the jury that the defendant was liable if the premises were "not put in safe repair by reason of the want of ordinary skill or care in workmanship or selection of materials on the part of the defendant." The defendant contended in support of an exception taken to this part of the charge, "that upon a gratuitous undertaking of this nature the defendant could only be held responsible for bad faith or for gross negligence." His contention was not sustained and his exceptions were overruled. Ames, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said (105 Mass. at page 479, 480): "It appears to us that this is one of the cases in which there is no practical difference between gross negligence and the want of ordinary care and skill; and that the omission of what Baron Rolfe calls a mere vituperative epithet is not a valid objection to the judge's charge. The true question for the jury was whether the defendant had discharged the duty which he had assumed with that due regard to the rights of the other party which might reasonably have been expected of him under all the circumstances."

After referring to the case of The New World v. King, 16 How. 469, 14 L. ed. 1019, he added: "The law furnishes no definition of gross negligence as distinguished from want of reasonable and ordinary care, which can be of any practical utility. The question of reasonable care must always depend on the special circumstances of each case, and is almost of necessity a question of fact rather than of law. The degrees of negligence, so often spoken of in the text-books, do not admit of such precision and exactness of definition as to be of any practical advantage in the administration of justice, without a detail of the facts which they are intended to designate. The New World v. King, supra; Chandler v. Worcester Mut. F. Ins. Co. 3 Cush. 328; Wilson v. Brett, 11 Mees. & W. 113, 152 Eng. Reprint, 737, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 264; Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. L. R. 1 C. P. 600, 35 L. J. C. P. N. S. 321, 12 Jur. N. S. 727, 14 L. T. N. S. 711, 14 Week Rep. 893, 4 Eng. Rul. Cas. 680."

The same learned judge in delivering the opinion of this court in the later case of Jenkins v. Bacon, 111 Mass. 373, at page 376, 15 Am. Rep. 33, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 781 (a case of gratuitous bailment), said: "According to the well-settled rule, the bailee who acts without compensation can only be held responsible for bad faith or gross negligence, if the deposit should be lost or injured while in his custody. Whitney v. Lee, 8 Met. 91, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 789; Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 479, 9 Am. Dec. 168, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 502."

In Smith v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. 174 Mass. 576, at page 578, 47 L.R.A. 323, 75 Am. St. Rep. 374, 55 N. E. 380, 7 Am. Neg. Rep. 54, Holmes, Ch. J., said: "If the rule is to be adhered to, that there can be no recovery for sickness due to the purely internal operation of fright caused by a negligent act, it cannot be avoided by calling the negligence gross, and alleging that the defendant ought to have known that the result complained of would follow his act. Negligence with reference to a given consequence . . . ought to have been foreseen, and although the distinction between gross negligence and negligence is known to the law, still, having regard to the grounds for the above-mentioned rule, to allow it to be avoided by such an allegation would be to do away with it."

Apart from the opinions expressed in these common-law cases, the question whether, in the administration of justice, it is possible or practicable to draw a distinction between ordinary and gross negligence, has been put to rest in this commonwealth by decisions under statutes which have made a distinction between the two. It was provided as early as 1840 (Stat. 1840, chap. 80), and has been continued in a number of statutes enacted since then (for a collection of these statutes, see Hudson v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 185 Mass. 510, 71 N. E. 66, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 366; Brooks v. Fitchburg & L. Street R. Co. 200 Mass. 8, 86 N. E. 289), that va rious persons and corporations should be liable to a penalty if the death of a person was caused through the gross negligence of their servants.* And by Stat. 1871, chap. 352, now Rev. Laws, chap. 111, § 268, it was provided that a railroad corporation should be liable for an accident at a grade crossing where the statutory signals have not been given, unless "the person injured, or the person who had charge of his person or property, was, at the time of the collision, guilty of gross or wilful negligence, . . . and that such gross or wilful negligence . . . contributed to the accident." Both sets of statutes made a distinction between gross and ordinary negligence. Although judges of this court have had the same difficulty in determining the meaning of gross negligence under these statutes that they had as to the meaning of that term at common law (see Knowlton, J., in Phelps v. New England R. Co. 172 Mass. 98, 100, 51 N. E. 522, and Hammond, J., in Evensen v. Lexington & B. Street R. Co. 187 Mass. 77, 79, 72 N. E. 355), yet it is settled that the term "gross negligence" in these statutes means a materially greater want of care than ordinary negligence. The distinction between the two has been recognized in numberless cases, but the meaning of gross negligence as distinguished from a want of ordinary care has been defined (in the way stated above) in the following cases under the death statutes: Galbraith v. West End Street R. Co. 165 Mass. 572, 43 N. E. 501; Morey v. Gloucester Street R. Co. 171 Mass. 165, 50 N. E. 530; Phelps v. New England R. Co. 172 Mass. 98, 51 N. E. 522; Evensen v. Lexington & B. Street R. Co. 187 Mass. 77, 72 N. E. 355; Brennan v. Standard Oil Co. 187 Mass. 376, 73 N. E. 472; Dolphin v. Worcester Consol. Street R. Co. 189 Mass. 270, 75 N. E. 635; Spooner v. Old Colony Street R. Co. 190 Mass. 132, 76 N. E. 660; Pearlstein v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 192 Mass. 20, 77 N. E. 1024; Manning v. Conway, 192 Mass. 122, 78 N. E. 401; Lanci v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 197 Mass. 32, 83 N. E. 1; Dimauro v. Linwood Street R. Co. 200 Mass. 147, 85 N. E. 894; Devine v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 205 Mass. 416, 91 N. E. 522; Renaud v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 208 Mass. 557, 92 N. E. 710; Adams v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 214 Mass. 1, 100 N. E. 1012. And it has been defined in the same way in three cases arising under the statutes as to the failure to give signals at grade crossings in Rev. Laws, chap. 111, § 268. Copley v. New Haven

& N. Co. 136 Mass. 6; Debbins v. Old Colony R. Co. 154 Mass. 402, 28 N. E. 274; Emery v. Boston & M. R. Co. 173 Mass. 136, 53 N. E. 278. In further explanation of the meaning of gross negligence under these statutes, it is settled that it is something less than the wilful, wanton, and reckless conduct which makes a defendant liable to a trespasser. Banks v. Braman, 188 Mass. 367, 74 N. E. 594. Note to Fitzmaurice v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 192 Mass. 159, 162 [6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1146, 116 Am. St. Rep. 236, 78 N. E. 418, 7 Ann. Cas. 586, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 564]; Lanci v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 197 Mass. 32, 83 N. E. 1.

Whether Mr. Wharton and the commentators referred to by Mr. Justice Curtis in The New World v. King, ubi supra, are right or wrong as to the existence of degrees of negligence in the civil law, it is plain that in this commonwealth that distinction exists. And it is not necessary in deciding that question to go outside of the law which is administered here. The distinction was first put forward in England in 1703, in Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909, 92 Eng. Reprint, 107, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 370, 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 247, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 948. It was adopted in this commonwealth in Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 479, 9 Am. Dec. 168, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 502, in 1821, and the rule adopted in that case was (in the words of Chief Justice Shaw in Whitney v. Lee, ubi supra) "settled on great consideration and after full deliberation, . . . and this supersedes the necessity of any full review of the authorities." The decision in Foster v. Essex Bank (involving the distinction between gross and ordinary negligence) was affirmed by this court in Whitney v. Lee, 8 Met. 91, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 789; Smith v. First Nat. Bank, 99 Mass. 605, 97 Am. Dec. 59, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 523; and Jenkins v. Bacon, 111 Mass. 373, 15 Am. Rep. 33, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 781. And (in spite of Preston v. Prather, 137 U. to the subsequent opinion of the same learned judge in Jenkins v. Bacon) to have been a doubt which, on a review of all the common-law authorities, no longer exists in this commonwealth. In addition, that doubt has been put at rest so far as this commonwealth is concerned by the decisions of this court under statutes which made the distinction between gross and ordinary negligence. No one familiar with the jurisprudence of Massachusetts could question to-day the existence in this commonwealth of the distinction between gross and ordinary negligence.

In spite of the decisions in Giblin v. McMullen, supra, Moffatt v. Bateman, L. R. 3 P. C. 115, 22 L. T. N. S. 140, 6 Moore, P. C. C. N. S. 369, 16 Eng. Reprint, 765, and Coughlin v. Gillison [1899] 1 Q. B. 145, 68 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 147, 47 Week. Rep. 113, 79 L. T. N. S. 627, a doubt arises as to the measure of liability in England in a case where a person enters upon a gratuitous undertaking. That doubt arises from the terms used by Chief Justice Holt in stating the liability of a bailee in case of the sixth sort of bailment discussed by him in his opinion in Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909, 913, 92 Eng. Reprint, 107, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 307, 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 247, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 948, and those used by Collins, M. R., in delivering the judgment of the court of appeal in Harris v. Perry & Co. [1903] 2 K. B. 219, 226, 72 L. J. K. B. N. S. 725, 89 L. T. N. S. 174, 19 Times L. R. 537. In delivering the judgment in Coggs v. Bernard, Lord Holt first laid it down (page 913) that, in case of a gratuitous bailment of goods for the sole benefit of the bailor, the bailee "is not answerable if they are stole without any fault in him; neither will a common neglect make him chargeable, but he must be guilty of some gross neglect." This was the first sort of bailment considered by Chief Justice Holt in Coggs v. Bernard. When the chief justice came to the sixth sort of bailment considered by him in that judgment, namely, an undertaking to transport goods where the bailee was to have no reward for his pains, he said (at pages 918, 919): "Then the bailee having undertaken to manage the goods, and having managed them ill, and so by his neglect a damage has happened to the bailor, which is the case in question, what will you call this? In Bracton, lib. 3, 100, it is called 'mandatum.' . . . It is what we call in English 'an acting by commission.' And if a man acts by commission for another gratis, and in the executing his commission behaves himself negligently, he is answerable. . . . This undertaking obliges the undertaker to a diligent management."

Harris v. Perry & Co. ubi supra, was a case in which an inspector of work being done in the construction of an underground railway, at the time of the accident, was riding gratis for his own convenience at the invitation of one of the defendant's officers, on the engine of a construction train in place of using a plank walk constructed by the defendant to enable inspectors to oversee the work. While so riding he was injured by the negligence of the defendant's agents. In delivering the judgment of the court of appeal in that case. Collins, M. R. after stating that there was evidence of a trap and so liability even if the plaintiff was a licensee, said: "At all events, I think it was competent for the jury to find, as they must be taken to have found, a failure of that ordinary care which is due from a person who undertakes the carriage of another gratuitously. . . . There is an obvious difference between the measure of confidence reposed and responsibility accepted in the case of a person who merely receives permission to traverse the premises of another, and in the case where a person or his property is received into the custody of another for transportation. See in the case of goods, Southcote's Case, 4 Coke. 83b, 76 Eng. Reprint, 1061, cited in Coggs v. Bernard, and the notes thereto."

It would appear on the first reading of these two judgments that both the learned judges intended to make a distinction between the care which has to be exercised in case of a gratuitous bailment, and that which has to be exercised in case of a gratuitous undertaking of transportation. But upon a full consideration of the matter it cannot be taken that either of them intended to make that distinction.

Coggs v. Bernard was before the court on a motion in arrest of judgment after a verdict for the plaintiff. The motion in arrest of judgment was based on the ground, and solely on the ground, that it was not alleged in the declaration that the defendant was to be paid for his pains. All that was before the court was the proposition that a defendant could be liable in case of a gratuitous transportation. No question was raised as to the measure of the defendant's liability in a case of a gratuitous transportation if there was liability in such a case. The chief justice disposed of the contention that a gratuitous undertaking to transport was a nudum pactum by pointing out the distinction between the case where a defendant fails to enter upon a gratuitous undertaking and the case where, having entered upon it, he is negligent in carrying it out. The fact that, in stating that there was liability in a case where the defendant had entered upon a gratuitous undertaking, Chief Justice Holt was not careful to state with accuracy the measure of that liability, cannot be taken to be decisive. That question was not up for decision at that time.

The same is true of that part of the judgment of Collins, M. R., in Harris v. Perry & Co., quoted above. The contention in Harris v. Perry & Co. to which Collins, M. R., was addressing himself, was that the plaintiff in that case was a licensee, and that since he was a licensee he could not recover at all. In addressing himself to that contention Collins, M. R., said (first) there was evidence of a trap, and (secondly) that apart from that there was evidence on which the jury could find that there was a failure of care on the part of the defendant. To be sure he spoke of a lack of ordinary care in place of gross negligence. When one takes into account the fact that gross negligence is a term with which the English judges have quarreled continually, it is perhaps natural that Collins, M. R., did not go out of his way to speak of gross negligence, and did speak of "ordinary care." Moreover it is to be noticed that what Collins, M. R., said was: "A failure of that ordinary care which is due from a person who undertakes the carriage of another gratuitously."

But upon the question of the true interpretation of these two judgments there is more to be said. In his note to Coggs v. Bernard, Mr. Smith has this to say at pages 103, 104, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 1st Eng. ed.: "VI. Mandatum.—The sixth and last class of bailments is (according to Lord Holt) mandatum, or 'a delivery of goods to somebody who is to carry them, or to do something about them, gratis. And this might have been classed under the same head as depositum. For, as the keeping, carrying, and working upon goods for hire are all included, both by Lord Holt and Sir W. Jones, under the same head, there seems no good reason why the keeping, carrying, and working upon them gratuitously should not have been so likewise. Certain it is that the liabilities of the depository and of the mandatary are precisely the same; both (in the absence, at least, of a contract in special terms) are bound to slight diligence, and to slight diligence only, and liable for nothing short of gross negligence, the reason in each case being the same, namely, that neither is to receive any reward for his services. Accordingly, whenever the extent of a mandatary's liability is discussed, we find the cases respecting that of depositaries cited and relied upon, and so vice versa. The cases of Beauchamp v. Powley, 1 Moody & R. 38; Shiells v. Blackburne, 1 H. Bl. 158, 126 Eng. Reprint, 94, 2 Revised Rep. 750; and L.R.A.1918C.

Dartnall v. Howard, 4 Barn. & C. 345, 107 Eng. Reprint, 1088, the facts of which are respectively stated at the commencement of this note, were decisions on the responsibility of mandataries, and from those, as well as from the general principle, it appears that such bailees are liable for gross negligence, and for that only."

It is to be observed in connection with Mr. Smith's statement ("accordingly, whenever the extent of a mandatary's liability is discussed, we find the cases respecting that of depositaries cited and relied upon") that Harris v. Perry & Co., a case of a gratuitous mandatum, was decided on the authority of Southcote's Case, 4 Coke, 83b, 76 Eng. Reprint, 1061, a case of a gratuitous depositum. And that is true of West v. Poor, 196 Mass. 183, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 936, 124 Am. St. Rep. 541, 81 N. E. 960, also; that case (a case of a gratuitous mandatum) was decided on the authority of Whitney v. Lee, 8 Met. 91, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 789, which was the case of a gratuitous depositum. There is more to be said with respect to the proper interpretation of Lord Holt's judgment in Coggs v. Bernard, concerning a distinction between a gratuitous bailment and an undertaking of gratuitous transportation; that is that the third and fourth editions of Smith's Leading Cases were edited by Mr. (afterwards Mr. Justice) Keating and by Mr. (afterwards Mr. Justice) Willes, and that the seventh, eighth, and ninth editions of Smith's Leading Cases were edited (with Mr. Arbuthnot) by Lord (then Mr.) Collins, who, when master of the rolls, delivered the judgment in Harris v. Perry & Co. The statement of Mr. Smith quoted above (that there is no distinction between the measure of the liability in case of a gratuitous bailment and that in a case of a gratuitous transportation) has been left untouched by these three learned editors of that learned work. The fact that this statement was left untouched by Lord Collins would seem to be decisive of the question now under consideration so far as Lord Collins's judgment in Harris v. Perry & Co. is concerned. There were some additions made in these editions to Mr. Smith's statement, but these additions did not even modify, much less change, the statement of Mr. Smith which we have set forth above. These additions may be found at page 104 in the third English edition, page 184 in the fourth English edition, page 247 in the seventh English edition, page 261 in the eighth English edition, and page 397 in the ninth American edition, which is a reprint (with additional notes) of the ninth English edition.

A ruling at nisi prius upon the question now before us was recently made in Karavias v. Gallinocos, 143 L. T. Jo. 237. In that case the jury found that the defendant was not guilty of gross, but was guilty of ordinary, negligence. Mr. Justice Avory (who made the ruling) stated that the question, "in the state of the authorities, [was] a fit question to be taken to the court of appeal," but since judgment was entered for the plaintiff in Harris v. Perry & Co. [1903] 2 K. B. 219, 226, 72 L. J. K. B. N. S. 725, 89 L. T. N. S. 174, 19 Times L. R. 537, on a finding that the defendant in that case was guilty of ordinary negligence, he felt bound to enter judgment for the plaintiff on the findings made in Karavias v. Gallinocos.

It would seem that in England the liability of a gratuitous bailee and the liability of one who undertakes a gratuitous transportation are the same. And to this one thing more must be added; namely, however much the English judges have quarreled with the meaning of the words "gross negligence," it is the fact that when pushed to a decision the judges of England have invariably held that to make out liability in case of a gratuitous undertaking (no matter what the nature of the gratuitous undertaking was) gross negligence has to be made out. Giblin v. McMullen, L. R. 2 P. C. 317, 5 Moore, P. C. 434, 16 Eng. Reprint, 578, 38 L. J. P. C. N. S. 25, 21 L. T. N. S. 214, 17 Week. Rep. 445; Moffatt v. Bateman, L. R. 3 P. C. 115, 22 L. T. N. S. 140, 6 Moore, P. C. C. N. S. 369, 16 Eng. Reprint, 765; Coughlin v. Gillison [1899] 1 Q. B. 145, 68 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 147, 47 Week. Rep. 113, 79 L. T. N. S. 627.

In holding that to charge a defendant with liability in case of a gratuitous undertaking to transport a person, the plaintiff must prove gross negligence, because that is the measure of liability in case of the gratuitous undertaking to keep or carry goods, it is not to be understood that gross negligence in the two cases is the same thing. In all cases (no matter whether the case is a case of ordinary or of gross negligence) the consequence likely to result is a fact to be taken into consideration in determining what ought to be done by the defendant to fulfil his measure of his liability. For example: It might be held that the omission to do a certain thing in the transportation of goods was not negligence, and that by reason of the seriousness of the consequences likely to result the omission to do the same thing in case of the transportation of a person would be negligence; and so in case of gross in place of ordinary negligence. For this general principle see, for example, Hartford v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 184 Mass. 365, 68 N. E. 835; Mullins v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 201 Mass. 38, 87 N. E. 476; Martin v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 205 Mass. 16, 91 N. E. 159.

This brings us to the consideration of Davis v. Central Cong. Soc. 129 Mass. 367, 37 Am. Rep. 368, a case upon which the plaintiff has placed great reliance. In that case it was decided that the defendant society was liable to the plaintiff, who had been invited to attend a conference held in the defendant society's church, at which the plaintiff was not a delegate, for injuries suffered by the plaintiff through a dangerous condition in the path leading to the church, upon the jury finding that the defendant was negligent in the matter. That case has usually been cited when the doctrine that a charity is not liable for torts under the decision in McDonald v. Massachusetts General Hospital, 120 Mass. 432, 21 Am. Rep. 529, has been set up in defense. It has never been affirmed as a decision upon the duty owed by a defendant who invites a plaintiff to enter upon his (the defendant's) land solely for his (the plaintiff's) purposes, unless it can be held to have been affirmed or approved on that point by what was said by Barker, J., in Chapin v. Holyoke Y. M. C. A. 165 Mass. 280, 281, 42 N. E. 1130. Of the decision in Davis v. Central Cong. Soc. it is to be observed that it was decided at a time when the distinction between a person going on the premises of the defendant for business to be transacted with the defendant, and persons going upon those premises for business of their own (Plummer v. Dill, 156 Mass. 426, 32 Am. St. Rep. 463, 31 N. E. 128, and Hart v. Cole, 156 Mass. 475, 16 L.R.A. 557, 31 N. E. 644), had not been established. Were the case to arise to-day it might be contended that, since the plaintiff in Davis v. Central Cong. Soc. went on the defendant's premises for her own purposes, she was in no better position than the plaintiffs in Plummer v. Dill and Hart v. Cole. It is hard to see a distinction between the rights of a plaintiff expressly invited to attend a church conference to which she was not a delegate, and a plaintiff impliedly invited to attend a funeral or a wake. But however that may be, the decision in Davis v. Central Cong. Soc. has no bearing on the question now before us. Whether one invited to come onto the defendant's premises for his (the invitee's) purposes alone takes them as he finds them, or can hold the defendant for negligence in case the premises are in a dangerous condition, is a question of the obligation assumed by one inviting another to come upon his land; while the extent of the obligation assumed by inviting one to travel gratis in the inviter's carriage is a question of the liability of one who enters upon a gratuitous undertaking, whether it be a gratuitous undertaking to keep, carry, or lend.

As matter of authority West v. Poor, 196 Mass. 183, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 936, 124 Am. St. Rep. 541, 81 N. E. 960, ought not to be overruled. It must be taken to be established in this commonwealth that to charge a gratuitous bailee the plaintiff must make out gross negligence on his part. Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 479, 9 Am. Dec. 168, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 502; Whitney v. Lee, 8 Met. 91, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 789; Smith v. First Nat. Bank, 99 Mass. 605, 97 Am. Dec. 59, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 523; Jenkins v. Bacon, 111 Mass. 373, 15 Am. Rep. 33, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 781. The measure of liability of one who undertakes to carry gratis is the same as that of one who undertakes to keep gratis. To this is to be added the fact that, in every case in England in which the question of the measure of liability of a person who enters upon any gratuitous undertaking has arisen, the same conclusion has been reached. Giblin v. McMullen; Moffatt v. Bateman and Coughlin v. Gillison, supra. From an examination of the cases, apart from Gill v. Middleton, in which a contrary conclusion has been reached, it is apparent that they depend upon the decision in Corrigan v. Union Sugar Refinery, 98 Mass. 577, 96 Am. Dec. 685, or upon the proposition that degrees in negligence are not known to the common law. We are of opinion in the first place, for reasons already stated, that the principle of Corrigan v. Union Sugar Refinery does not bear upon the measure of liability of one who invites another to ride gratis in his carriage; and in the second place, that in this commonwealth at any rate degrees of negligence are known to the law. Gill v. Middleton was decided on the authority of cases in England and in the Supreme Court of the United States, since repudiated in Giblin v. McMullen, supra, and in New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 382, 383, 21 L. ed. 627, 641, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 624. In Gill v. Middleton the proposition was stated that "the law furnishes no definition of gross negligence, as distinguished from want of reasonable and ordinary care, which can be of any practical utility."

That proposition is not law in this commonwealth to-day. In addition the decision in Gill v. Middleton is in conflict with that in Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 479, 9 Am. Dec. 168, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 502, and the subsequent cases affirming that decision, and with West v. Poor. We are of opinion L.R.A.1918C.

that Gill v. Middleton and the cases following it* are not law in this respect, and that they should be overruled in so far as they conflict with those cases. A word of explanation should be added with respect to what was said of Gill v. Middleton in the case of Thomas v. Lane, 221 Mass. 447, L.R.A.1916F, 1077, 109 N. E. 363. Gill v. Middleton involved inter alia these two propositions; namely, first, that a defendant who undertakes to do an act gratis for the benefit of the plaintiff is liable if guilty of the requisite negligence; and, second, that since "the law furnishes no definition of gross negligence, as distinguished from want of reasonable and ordinary care, which can be of any practical utility," the defendant is liable in such a case if the plaintiff proves that he was guilty of ordinary negligence. In Thomas v. Lane, supra, an attack was made upon the first of these two propositions. It was held that that attack had to fail. There was no occasion at that time to consider, or rather to reconsider, the second of these two propositions, and that proposition was not then passed upon. So far as the first of these two propositions is concerned Gill v. Middleton is law, as was stated in Thomas v. Lane, supra, but so far as the second proposition is concerned that case is now overruled.

Approaching the question apart from authority we are led to the same conclusion. Justice requires that the one who undertakes to perform a duty gratuitously should not be under the same measure of obligation as one who enters upon the same undertaking for pay. There is an inherent difficulty in stating the difference between the measure of duty which is assumed in the two cases. But justice requires that, to make out liability in case of a gratuitous undertaking, the plaintiff ought to prove a materially greater degree of negligence than he has to prove where the defendant is to be paid for doing the same thing. It is a distinction which seventy-five years' practice in this commonwealth has shown is not too indefinite a one to be drawn by the judge and acted upon by the jury.

We are of opinion that the decision in West v. Poor should be affirmed and followed in the case at bar.

In the view which we have taken it has not been necessary to consider the doctrine of Southcote v. Stanley, 1 Hurlst. & N. 247, 156 Eng. Reprint, 1195, 25 L. J. Exch. N. S. 339, 19 Eng. Rul. Cas. 60, as to which see Plummer v. Dill, 156 Mass. 426, 427, 32 Am. St. Rep. 463, 31 N. E. 128, and Hart v. Cole, 156 Mass. 475, 477, 16 L.R.A. 557, 31 N. E. 644.

*The rule of Gill v. Middleton was applied in Riley v. Lissner, 160 Mass. 330, 35 N. E. 1130; Buldra v. Henin, 212 Mass. 275, 98 N. E. 863; McLeod v. Rawson, 215 Mass. 257, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 547, 102 N. E. 429; and it was referred to as law in Dix v. Old Colony Street R. Co. 202 Mass. 518, 523, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 567, 89 N. E. 109, and in Stewart v. Cushing, 204 Mass. 154, 157, 90 N. E. 545.

The plaintiff has sought to bring this case within Loftus v. Pelletier, 223 Mass. 63, 111 N. E. 712, by suggesting that the jury could have found that the defendant gave the invitation to get the plaintiff's society at the time in question. In Loftus v. Pelletier the plaintiff had a right to be transported by reason of the fact that she had paid for such transportation by her services as a nurse. The transportation in the case at bar was gratuitous.

The entry must be: Judgment on the verdict.

Annotation—Automobiles: liability of owner or operator for injury to guest.

This note supplements the notes to Beard v. Klusmeier, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1100, and Perkins v. Galloway, L.R.A. 1916E, 1190.

As to liability for injury to passenger by negligent operation of automobile, see notes to Johnson v. Coey, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 81, and Hinds v. Steere, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 658.

It will be noticed that the court in MASSALETTI v. FITZROY, ante, 264, imposes upon the owner of an automobile who has invited a guest to ride liability for an injury to the latter through the operation of the car only in case of gross negligence on the part of the owner or his servant. It goes to great length to show that the different degrees of negligence still obtain in Massachusetts. Aside from the fact that, in some jurisdictions at least, the different degrees of negligence are no longer recognized, the rule requiring the owner of an automobile to exercise ordinary and reasonable care toward a guest whom he has invited to ride with him appears sound, and not to impose too great a burden upon the owner. As stated in the earlier annotation, the tendency of the cases appears to be toward this rule, and it has been adopted in two cases decided since the preparation of the last note.

Thus, in Jacobs v. Jacobs (1917) 141 La. 272, L.R.A.1917F, 253, 74 So. 992, it was held that, although an invited guest of the driver of an automobile, being a mere licensee, was not entitled to the consideration due from a carrier to a passenger for hire, he was nevertheless entitled to the benefit of the provisions of the Civil Code that any act of negligence or imprudence that causes injury or loss to another obliges him who was at fault to pay for the injury or loss. The court here said, with regard to the care required of the driver of an automobile for the safety of a passenger riding as a guest, that it did not recognize the distinction referred to in some jurisdictions between gross or wilful negligence and the ordinary negligence or imprudence referred to in the provisions of the Civil Code, and stated that it agreed with the doctrine recognized in Beard v. Klusmeier (1914) 158 Ky. 153, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1100, 164 S. W. 319, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 342, which was approved in Fitzjarrell v. Boyd (1914) 123 Md. 497, 91 Atl. 547, that a guest in an automobile is entitled to demand that his host shall exercise ordinary care for his safety in driving the car, and that the latter's liability is not confined to acts of gross negligence or wilful recklessness. The evidence in this case, however, was held to show no negligence on the part of the defendant, and it was stated that the plaintiff's failure to warn the defendant when he saw that he did not know that the road ahead was unsafe was the only neglect on the part of any occupant of the car that caused or contributed to the accident.

On the second appeal of Perkins v. Galloway (1917) — Ala. —, 73 So. 956, in accord with the conclusion reached on the first appeal in (1915) 194 Ala. 265, L.R.A.1916E, 1190, 69 So. 875, it was held that the owner and driver of an automobile was liable for the wrongful death of an invited guest due to the owner's failure to exercise reasonable care in the operation of the car. The court said: "It does seem to be a harsh or hard rule which makes the carrier or host liable to the passenger or guest as for injury or death in the absence of gross negligence or wantonness, especially when the passenger or guest is treated by the carrier or host just as the latter himself is treated, and when both are injured by the same accident, as in this case. If this be so, the reply is: The law is so written, and cannot and should not be changed to meet hard cases: such instability would make shipwreck of the law. The liability of the owner of an automobile to a guest riding for pleasure only was recognized, but not decided, in the case of Powers v. Williamson (1915) 189 Ala. 600, 66 So. 585. That decision however, went off on the ground that the owner of the machine was not in that case liable for the negligence of his son, who was operating the car; that is, that the doctrine of respondeat superior did not apply in that case. It is, however, a necessary conclusion that the owner would have been held liable in that case had the son been held to be the agent of his father, the defendant, or had the father, who was the owner, been operating the machine and been guilty of negligence proximately contributing to the injury. It is very true that it has been held that a gratuitous carrier of goods, like a gratuitous bailee of goods, is not liable to the owner of the goods in the absence of gross negligence. This distinction is well pointed out by Mr. Hutchinson (Carriers, vol. 2, § 1022, p. 1179), who says: 'This, it will be observed, is different from the well-settled rule in regard to the gratuitous carriage of goods, which, as has been seen, does not impose upon the common carrier the same degree of responsibility as when the carriage is for compensation, and this illustrates the different light in which the two kinds of business are viewed by the law. The carrier of goods becomes an insurer of their safety only when he is paid to become so; but the carrier of the passenger is bound to the utmost care and caution whether paid by the passenger or not; and this distinction is based upon wholly different reasons of public policy, being in the one case the value which it puts upon human life and personal safety, and in the other the necessity of preventing frauds and combinations, to the "undoing of all persons" who may have dealings of that kind with the carrier. This distinction between the gratuitous bailment of goods to the carrier and the gratuitous carriage of the passenger is, upon this ground, well established, and in the latter case the carrier's liability is the same as when he is paid for the carriage.' "

In this case, although the guest was not invited to ride by the defendant, but by another person who was in the automobile, it was held that, as the defendant knew of the guest's presence in the car, the duty not to injure him was the same as if he had expressly invited him to ride.

In Karavias v. Gallinocos (1917) 143 L. T. Jo. (Eng.) 237, where the defendant had invited the plaintiff to ride in his motor car and the latter had sustained an injury, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, the jury having found that the defendant had failed to exercise reasonable care, but that he was not guilty of gross negligence. The court, however, expressed some doubt upon the question involved, and stated that it was a fit question to be taken to the court of appeals whether in such a case it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove gross negligence to entitle him to recover.

TEXAS CRIMINAL COURT OF APPEALS.

EX PARTE TOM O. STOUT.

(— Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 198 S. W. 967.)

Municipal corporations — power to prevent picketing.

1. Power to prevent the use of sidewalks for picketing is conferred upon a municipal corporation by charter authority to control the streets and highways, to abate nuisances, and to preserve order.

For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, II. c, 4, b, (1), in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Note. — As to validity of statute or ordinance against picketing, see annotation following this case, post, 282.

Constitutional law — freedom of speech — prohibition of picketing.

2. The constitutional freedom of speech is not infringed by forbidding the use of the sidewalks of a municipal corporation for picketing.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, II. d, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Municipal corporations — ordinance — conflict with statute — picketing.

3. A statute authorizing the formation of trade unions and making it lawful for members thereof to induce persons to quit their employment or not to enter them does not prevent the enactment of an ordinance forbidding the use of the sidewalks to persuade by signs or word of mouth persons from patronizing certain places of business.

For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, II. c, 4, b, (1), in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — reasonableness of ordinance.

4. An ordinance forbidding the use of the sidewalks for picketing to prevent persons from patronizing certain places of business is not unreasonable.

For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, II. c, 4, b, (1), in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to secure petitioner's release from custody to which he had been committed for picketing in alleged violation of an ordinance of the city of El Paso. Petitioner remanded.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hudspeth, Dale, & Harper for petitioner.

Messrs. J. M. McBroom and E. B. Hendrick, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Prendergast, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Before May 14, 1917, the city council of El Paso, its lawmaking power, duly enacted, and on that date was in force, the following ordinance:

"An Ordinance to Regulate Walking Back and Forth, Loitering or Remaining on the Streets and Sidewalks in the City of El Paso, Texas.

"Be it Ordained by the City Council of the City of El Paso, Texas:

"Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any person or persons to walk back and forth, loiter or remain, or cause any person to walk back and forth, loiter or remain upon the streets or sidewalks in the city of El Paso, Texas, in front of any business house for the purpose of persuading any person or persons by word of mouth from entering said place or places of business for the purpose of transacting business therein.

"Sec. 2. It shall be unlawful for any person or persons to walk back and forth, loiter or remain, or cause any person to walk back and forth, loiter or remain upon the streets or sidewalks in the city of El Paso, Texas, in front of any business house for the purpose of persuading any person or persons by signs carried from entering said place or places of business for the purpose of transacting business therein.

"Sec. 3. Provided, that neither of the foregoing sections shall be held to render it unlawful for any member or members of any trade union, organization or association, or any other person to induce, or attempt to induce by peaceable and lawful means, any person to accept any particular employment, or quit or relinquish any particular employ- ment in which such person may then be engaged, or to enter any pursuit, or refuse to enter any pursuit, or quit or relinquish any pursuit in which such person may then be engaged: Provided, that such member or members shall not have the right to invade or trespass upon the premises of another without the consent of the owner thereof.

"Sec. 4. Any person or persons violating the foregoing ordinance shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not in excess of two hundred ($200) dollars.

"Sec. 5. Should it hereafter be discovered or adjudged by any court that any section or portion of this ordinance is unconstitutional, void or invalid for any reason, it shall not affect the validity or constitutionality of the remaining portions of this ordinance, unless such portion so declared unconstitutional, void or invalid is so interwoven with, or dependent upon other portions of said ordinance that the same cannot be enforced as intended by this ordinance.

"Sec. 6. Whereas, the fact that there is at present no sufficient ordinance regulating the standing, loitering or remaining upon the streets and sidewalks in the city of El Paso, Texas, creates a public emergency justifying the suspension of the charter rule requiring that all ordinances be read at two regular meetings of the city council, and the same is hereby suspended by the consent of the mayor and the unanimous vote of all aldermen present, and this ordinance shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage, approval and publication."

Said Stout was prosecuted for the violation of § 2 of said ordinance before the corporation court, was convicted, and fined $25, which he refused to pay. He was thereupon taken into custody by the chief of police of El Paso and held. He sued out a writ of habeas corpus before this court. The facts were agreed upon. At the time he was arrested he was doing "picketing" on the sidewalk in front of the Java Café at 314 San Antonio street in the city of El Paso, which consisted of his walking up and down the outer edge of the sidewalk, and back and forth in front of said café, carrying what is termed a "sandwich" badge on his breast, and a like badge on his back, which contained the following words: "This restaurant unfair to organized labor and sympathizers. Cooks', Waiters', & Waitresses' Union, Local 848. Labor is worthy of its hire." He did not engage in conversation, nor was anything said to him by anyone while so "picketing." He was a member of the Cooks', Waiters', & Waitresses' Union, Local 848, and was doing the "picketing" by authority of that union, and because the Java Café was not employing union cooks, waiters, and waitresses.

He attacks the validity of said ordinance:

1. Because he claims the city of El Paso had no authority to pass such an ordinance.

The charter of El Paso was a special act of the legislature of 1907, p. 24. Section 2 thereof gives said city this power and authority: "The city of El Paso shall have power to enact and to enforce all ordinance necessary to protect health, life and property, and to prevent and summarily abate and remove nuisances, and to preserve and enforce the good government, order and security of the city and its inhabitants; to protect the lives, health and property of the inhabitants of said city, and to enact . . . any and all ordinances upon any subject: Provided, that no ordinance shall be enacted inconsistent with the laws of the state of Texas, or inconsistent with the provisions of this act; and provided, further, that the specification of particular powers shall never be construed as a limitation upon the general powers herein granted; it being intended by this act to grant and bestow upon the inhabitants of the city of El Paso full power of self-government, and it shall have and exercise all powers of municipal government not prohibited to it by this chapter or by some general law of the state of Texas or by the provisions of the Constitution of the state of Texas."

Section 56 also gives the city this power and authority: "The city council shall have complete and exclusive control and power over the streets, alleys, and highways of the city, and to abate and remove encroachments thereon; to open, alter, close, widen, extend, establish, regulate, sell, lease, grade, clean or otherwise improve said streets: Provided, no street shall ever be closed, sold or leased except for an adequate consideration, and not then except by the vote of at least three fourths of the aldermen and the approval of the mayor; to put drains or sewers therein and to prevent the encumbering thereof in any manner and to protect the same from encroachment or injury: Provided, that the city shall not be liable in damages at the suit of any person for injury, either to person or property, arising from an unsafe condition or want of repair of any street, square, alley, plaza, park, sidewalk, or public place in the city unless at least ten days before the injury occurred a notice in writing shall have been filed with the city clerk for the city council specifically pointing out the nature and exact locality of the defect, obstruction, or other thing that afterward occasions the injury."

The very object and purpose of municipal governments is to pass and enforce ordinances to preserve and enforce the good government, order, and security of it and its inhabitants, and to protect the lives, health, and property of its inhabitants. If they had no power to do these things their creation and maintenance might be useless. This power and authority given said city is ample and complete to authorize it to pass and enforce said ordinance for any of the objects or purposes specified, unless there is some constitutional or statutory provision which would prevent or prohibit it. Ex parte Sullivan, 77 Tex. Crim. Rep. 87, P.U.R. 1915E, 441, 178 S. W. 537, and authorities cited; Strauss v. State, 76 Tex. Crim. Rep. 135, 173 S. W. 663, and authorities cited.

2. The relator contends that said ordinance violates § 8, art. 1, of the Constitution of Texas, which provides: "Every person shall be at liberty to speak, write or publish his opinions on any subject, being responsible for the abuse of that privilege; and no law shall ever be passed curtailing the liberty of speech or of the press."

And he states it also violates subdivision 1 of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Under this attack he presents only the claimed invalidity under said provision of our state Constitution, and cites Ex parte Neill, 32 Tex. Crim. Rep. 276, 40 Am. St. Rep. 776, 22 S. W. 923; Ex parte Foster, 44 Tex. Crim. Rep. 427, 60 L.R.A. 631, 100 Am. St. Rep. 866, 71 S. W. 593; Mitchell v. Grand Lodge, F. A. M. 56 Tex. Civ. App. 306, 121 S. W. 179; St. Louis v. Gloner, 210 Mo. 502, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 973, 124 Am. St. Rep. 750, 109 S. W. 30, as sustaining him.

The Neill Case held an ordinance of Seguin void which enacted that the "Sunday Sun," a paper published at Chicago, was a nuisance, and prohibited its circulation in Seguin, and made it an offense for any person to sell it therein. This court therein held: "We are not informed of any authority which sustains the doctrine that a municipal corporation is invested with the power to declare the sale of newspapers a nuisance. The power to suppress one concedes the power to suppress all, whether such publications are political, secular, religious, decent or indecent, obscene or otherwise. The doctrine of the Constitution must prevail in this state, which clothes the citizen with liberty to speak, write, or publish his opinion on any and all subjects, subject alone to responsibility for the abuse of such privilege."

The Foster Case held a district judge could not, by an order in a criminal case, prohibit a newspaper from publishing the evidence given in the trial while being tried, and then punish for contempt one who did so publish the evidence, mainly because the Constitution required such trials to be public.

The court of civil appeals in the Mitchell Case held an injunction would not lie to prohibit the publication of a libel but said our supreme court had never so held, and that the courts of other states differed on the question. That court must have overlooked the cases of Ex parte Dupree, 101 Tex. 150, 105 S. W. 493; Ex parte Allison, 99 Tex. 463, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1116, 122 Am. St. Rep. 653, 90 S. W. 870. These cases were passing primarily on statutory provisions, but the principles announced would embrace rights without regard to statutory provisions. But whether these cases were overlooked or not, this case is not applicable, if for no other reason, because the offense had already been committed, and he was convicted for that, and this was no proceeding to enjoin or otherwise prevent him from committing such offense in future.

The Gloner Case from Missouri shows an altogether different case from this: that the ordinance held void made it a misdemeanor merely "for any person to lounge, stand, loaf around, about, or at street corners in the day or nighttime." That court said: "There is no pretense that defendant was at the time of this arrest in any way obstructing the street, or interfering with the rights of any person."

Section 2 of this ordinance does not make such an act only an offense, but makes it "unlawful for any person to walk back and forth upon the streets or sidewalks of the city of El Paso, in front of any business house, for the purpose of persuading any person, by signs carried, from entering said place of business for the purpose of transacting business therein."

The difference in this and the Missouri ordinance is so marked as to make comment unnecessary.

In Fitts v. Atlanta, 121 Ga. 567, 67 L.R.A. 803, 104 Am. St. Rep. 167, 49 S. E. 793, the ordinance prohibited anyone from making a speech on the streets without license from the city authorities, and made it an offense if one did so. Fitts so made a speech without license and was arrested and fined therefor. He refused to pay the fine, and was taken and held in custody, and sued out a writ of habeas corpus, seeking discharge, because of his constitutional right of free speech. Among other things the court held:

"The primary object of streets is for public passage. They should be kept open and unobstructed for that purpose. If damage accrues to passers by reason of improperly allowing them to be used for other purposes, the city may become liable. The streets of the city are peculiarly within the police control for the purpose of preserving and protecting their use by the public as thoroughfares. A man has many constitutional and legal rights which he cannot lawfully exercise in the streets of a city. Thus, every citizen has a right to lawfully acquire and hold personal property; but he has no right, constitutional or otherwise, to insist on storing his possessions in the street. Every man has the inalienable right to sleep and eat (if he has the edibles), but he has no constitutional right to make his bed or set his table in the street. Every man has not only the right to, but he should, bathe and cleanse himself, and change his raiment, if he has a change. This is a duty imposed by his individual constitution, if not by that of his country. But there is no constitutional right on his part to perform his ablutions or exercise the most necessary demands of his nature in the public streets. At proper times and in proper places one may make loud noises, or shoot a gun, or test his lung power vocally to a considerable extent, without offending against any law; but there is no right, inherent or constitutional, to make vociferous outcries or practise gunnery in the street. If Professor Fitt's idea of constitutional law were correct, I see no reason why every citizen should not claim a right to use the public streets for the exercise of his trade, calling, or profession, which may be much more essential to his welfare and that of the public than speechmaking by the plaintiff in certiorari, however eloquent, and regardless of the soundness or unsoundness of his argument.

"If the Constitution, state or Federal, guarantees to Professor Fitts the right to make public speeches on the streets of Atlanta, why does it not also guarantee the same right to every lecturer who may not desire to hire a hall, and to every showman who wishes to exhibit on the highway, or to every mechanic, artisan, merchant, or other citizen the right to ply his lawful vocation in the public thoroughfare? The constitutional right to exercise one's lawful vocation is quite as sacred, and often more important, than the right to make speeches; but the exercise of either right must yield to the municipal power properly exercised over the streets for the primary objects for which they were established. If everyone who has some constitutional right has also the constitutional right to exercise it in the streets of a city regardless of municipal regulations, these thoroughfares may soon become a gathering place of a numerous clan rivaling those adjuncts of modern exhibitions, which, since the term was used during the Columbian Exposition at Chicago in 1893, have come to be distinguished by the name of 'Midway Plaisance.' The right of the public in regard to the streets is to use them for passage as public highways, provided they are used lawfully for that purpose. But even the right of passage is subject to reasonable legislative regulations for the general good. Thus, idling and loitering in the public streets have generally been prohibited, and no one has yet doubted the constitutionality of such legislation."

See Love v. Judge of Recorder's Ct. (Love v. Phalen) 128 Mich. 545, 55 L.R.A. 618, 87 N. W. 785; Com. v. Davis, 162 Mass. 510, 26 L.R.A. 712, 44 Am. St. Rep. 389, 39 N. E. 113; and also Goldberg, B. & Co. v. Stablemen's Union, 149 Cal. 429, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 460, 117 Am. St. Rep. 145, 86 Pac. 806, 9 Ann. Cas. 1219; Jensen v. Cook & Waiters' Union, 39 Wash. 531, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 302, 81 Pac. 1069; Barnes v. Chicago Typographical Union, 232 Ill. 424, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1018, 83 N. E. 940, 13 Ann. Cas. 54.

The principles applicable to "picketing," made illegal as by this ordinance, have been held valid in other jurisdictions. See Re Williams, 158 Cal. 550, 111 Pac. 1035; Beck v. Railway Teamsters' Protective Union, 118 Mich. 497, 42 L.R.A. 407, 74 Am. St. Rep. 421, 77 N. W. 13; Otis Steel Co. v. Local Union (C. C.) 110 Fed. 698; Knudsen v. Benn (C. C.) 123 Fed. 636; and other cases.

In Re Williams, 158 Cal. 550, 111 Pac. 1035, such an ordinance, even less specific than this, was held valid. In the Beck Case, 118 Mich. 520, 42 L.R.A. 407, 74 Am. St. Rep. 421, 77 N. W. 13, the court held: "To picket complainants' premises in order to intercept their teamsters or persons going there to trade is unlawful. It itself is an act of intimidation, and an unwarrantable interference with the right of free trade. . . . It will not do to say that these pickets are thrown out for the purpose of peaceable argument and persuasion. They are intended to intimidate and coerce."

In the Otis Steel Co. Case, 110 Fed. 700, the court held: "Whether this picketing has been accompanied with violence or not we need not consider. It was certainly one of the means used by this defendant organization to enforce its mandate. While picketing may not be an occasion of war it certainly is an evidence that war exists, L.R.A.1918C.

and the term is appropriately borrowed from the nomenclature of actual warfare. This system, constantly kept up, in its nature leads to disturbance, and has a tendency to intimidate. . . . It is certainly true that this system of picketing, although it may not have been accompanied by violence on the part of those who have served as pickets, has and will do injury."

3. Relator further contends that said ordinance conflicts with articles 5244 and 5245 of the Revised Civil Statutes, and article 1478 of the Penal Code, and is therefore void on that account. Articles 5245 (Rev. Stat.) and 1478 (Penal Code) are exactly the same.

Whether these articles are in such conflict with said ordinance as to render it void is almost, if not entirely, a question of fact, to be determined by an inspection of them. In order to show clearly that they are not the same they will be quoted in parallel columns:

Art. 5244 (Rev. Stat.) is: It shall be lawful for any and all persons engaged in any kind of work or labor, manual or mental, or both, to associate themselves together and form trades unions and other organizations for the purpose of protecting themselves in their personal work, personal labor, and personal service, in their respective pursuits and employments.

Sec. 2 of said ordinance is: It shall be unlawful for any person or persons to walk back and forth, loiter or remain or cause any person to walk back and forth, loiter or remain upon the streets or sidewalks in the city of El Paso, Texas, in front of any business house for the purpose of persuading any person or persons by signs carried from entering said place or places of business for the purpose of transacting business therein.

Art. 5245 (Rev. Stat.) (Id. 1478, Penal Code) is: It shall not be held unlawful for any member or members of such trades union or other organization or association, or any other person, to induce or attempt to induce by peaceable and lawful means, any person to accept any particular employment, or quit or relinquish any particular employment in which such person may then be engaged, or to enter any pursuit, or refuse to enter any pursuit, or quit or relinquish any pursuit in which such person may then be engaged; Provided, that such member or members shall

Sec. 3 of said ordinance is: Provided, that neither of the foregoing sections shall be held to render it unlawful for any member or members of any trade union, organization, or association or any other person to induce, or attempt to induce by peaceable and lawful means, any person to accept any particular employment or quit or relinquish any particular employment in which such person may then be engaged, or to enter any pursuit or refuse to enter any pursuit or quit or relinquish any pursuit in which such person may then be engaged: Provided, not have the right to invade or trespass upon the premises of another without the consent of the owner thereof.

that such member or members shall not have the right to invade or trespass upon the premises of another without the consent of the owner thereof.

It is unnecessary to here copy § 1 of said ordinance. It and also the others have already been copied herein. Section 3 of the ordinance makes it perfectly plain that it was the intention of the city council of El Paso in passing the ordinance to expressly avoid conflict with both the civil and penal articles copied above. It is clear that they accomplished such intent. What was made lawful by said articles was for any and all persons engaged in any kind of labor to associate themselves together and form trades unions for the purpose of protecting themselves in their personal work and in their respective pursuits and employments; and that it should not be held unlawful for any member of said unions to induce, or attempt to induce, by peaceable and lawful means, any person to accept any particular employment or quit the same in which such person may be engaged, or to enter any pursuit or to refuse to do so, or quit or relinquish any pursuit in which any such person may then be engaged.

As stated above, § 2 of said ordinance made it an offense and unlawful for any person to walk back and forth upon the sidewalks of said city in front of any business house for the purpose of persuading any person by signs carried from entering said place of business for the purpose of transacting business therein,—a very distinct and different thing from that made lawful by articles 5244, 5245 (Rev. Stat.). It seems so clear that the ordinance is not in conflict with said statute that it is deemed unnecessary to further discuss the question. Of course, if there had been such conflict between the statute and the ordinance the ordinance could not stand, but would be invalid. Appellant cites a number of cases to the effect that where there is such conflict the ordinance is invalid. It is unnecessary to cite or discuss them, because the legal proposition laid down by them is correct.

4. The ordinance is not unreasonable, nor is it vague, uncertain, etc., so that it cannot be understood. The ordinance seems clear, plain, and easily understood. Instead of being unreasonable, it is most reasonable, under the circumstances. Authorities above are quoted which show that the acts of relator which are denounced by said ordinance were clearly intended to intimidate and coerce all union labor folks and their sympathizers, and others, from going into said restaurant or café and getting their meals, or having any other business transaction with the owner or proprietor thereof,—in other words, to injure and break up the proprietor's business. Such conduct as his would naturally lead to disturbances, and had a tendency to intimidate and prevent all persons from entering said restaurant, and would necessarily injure the proprietor in his business. There can be no doubt but that the proprietor or owner of said restaurant had a right to conduct his business to suit himself, and to employ union or nonunion laborers as suited him, and no one has the right to injure or disturb his business because he so chose to run it. The fact that his restaurant abutted upon the portion of the sidewalk where the relator was undertaking to injure and disturb him and his business of itself would give him some rights. It was the duty of the city of El Paso by such an ordinance to protect him in the conduct of his business, otherwise the city would not have been doing its duty to him and other citizens, "to preserve and enforce good government, order and security of the city and its inhabitants, and to protect the lives, health and property of its inhabitants."

The ordinance is not invalid and void, but, on the contrary, is valid and legal. The relator is therefore remanded to the custody of the marshal of the city of El Paso.

Annotation—Validity of statute or ordinance against picketing.

For cases dealing with picketing generally, especially injunctions against the same, see notes to Jensen v. Cooks' & Waiters' Union, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 302, and Re Langell, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 412.

The authorities are meager upon the question. In Ex PARTE STOUT, ante, 277, the court upholds the validity of a municipal ordinance forbidding the use of the sidewalks for picketing.

In Hardie-Tynes Mfg. Co. v. Cruise L.R.A.1918C.

(1914) 189 Ala. 66, 66 So. 657, which was a suit to enjoin defendant from interfering with plaintiff's employees, the court, in answer to a contention that the bill was demurrable in so far as it sought to prevent peaceable picketing and a peaceable persuasion of complainant's workmen to leave their employment, held that their statute which made it a misdemeanor for any persons or person to picket the works or place of business of another person, firm, or corporation for the purpose of interfering with or injuring any lawful business or enterprise, did not permit them to so hold, and held that such statute prohibited peaceful picketing when done for the purpose named in the statute, saying: "Perhaps our legislature has taken the view adopted by some of the courts, that in actual practice there is and can be no such thing as peaceful picketing or peaceful persuasion. Certainly this is the effect of our statutes." And in answer to a suggestion that their construction of the statute as inhibiting picketing even where threats or violence were not used rendered it unconstitutional, the court said: "No intimation is offered as to what provision of the Constitution is thereby offended, and we can think of none. Certain it is that a right to actively and directly interfere with and prevent the operation of the lawful business of another is not included among the inalienable rights of 'life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.' The 'liberty' guaranteed by the Constitution (art. 1, § 1) is liberty regulated by law and the social compact; and in order that all men may enjoy liberty it is but the tritest truism to say that every man must renounce unbridled license. So, wherever the natural rights of citizens would, if exercised without restraint, deprive other citizens of rights which are also and equally natural, such assumed rights must yield to the regulations of municipal law. If one man asserts the constitutional right of preventing another from the pursuit of a lawful business, what is to become of the undoubted constitutional right of that other person to pursue his business unmolested? It is clear that this motion of liberty utterly ignores 'the other fellow,' and denies to him the very freedom it claims for itself."

And in Re Williams (1910) 158 Cal. 550, 111 Pac. 1035, an appeal from a conviction under an ordinance making it a misdemeanor to picket premises for the purpose of intimidating, threatening, and coercing persons, to prevent them from doing and performing services on such premises, the court said it had no doubt that the ordinance was a valid exercise of the powers of the local legislature. National banks — conferring authority

1. Congress did not exceed its power under U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8, clause 18, to make "all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the powers expressly given by the Constitution,

Note. — The constitutionality of the provisions of the Federal Reserve Act, which authorizes the Federal Reserve Board to grant by special permit to national banks applying therefor, when not in contravention of state or local laws, the right to act as trustee, executor, administrator, or registrar of stocks and bonds under such rules and regulations as the board may prescribe, is now established by the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case above reported, which reverses the contrary decision of the Michigan supreme court in Atty. Gen. ex rel. Union Trust Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 192 Mich. 640, 159 N. W. 335. L.R.A.1918C.

when giving authority to the Federal Reserve Board by the Act of December 23, 1913, to grant by special permit to national banks applying therefor, when not in contravention of state or local law, the right to act as trustee, executor, administrator, or registrar of stocks and bonds under such rules and regulations as the board may prescribe.

Constitutional law — delegation of power — Federal Reserve Act.

2. Legislative power was not unconstitutionally conferred on the Federal Reserve Board by the Act of December 23, 1913, giving authority to that board to grant by special permit to national banks applying therefor, when not in contravention of state or local law, the right to act as trustee, executor, administrator, or registrar of stocks and bonds, under such rules and regulations as the board may prescribe.

Courts — conflicting jurisdiction — quo warranto — national bank.

3. The institution by a state attorney general in a state court of the proceeding in the nature of quo warranto to test the authority of a national bank, under the Act of December 23, 1913, to act as trustee, executor, administrator, or registrar of stocks and bonds, was impliedly, if not expressly, authorized by the provisions of that section giving such power only "when not in contravention of state or local law," and of the Act of June 3, 1864, making controversies concerning national banks cognizable in state courts.

ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan to review a judgment which, in a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto, held that the respondent could not be clothed with power by the Federal Reserve Board to act as trustee, executor, administrator, or registrar of stocks and bonds. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Chief Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

We are of opinion that the procedure resorted to was appropriate and that the state court was competent to administer relief, but we postpone stating our reasons on the subject until the merits have been passed upon.

The court below held that an act of Congress conferring on national banks additional powers was in excess of the authority of Congress, and was hence repugnant to the Constitution. 192 Mich. 640, 159 N. W. 335. The correctness of this conclusion is in substance the sole question for decision on the merits.

Although the powers given were new, the principles involved in the right to confer them were long since considered and defined in adjudged cases. We shall first consider the leading of such cases and then, after stating this case, determine whether they are controlling, causing the subject not to be open for original consideration.

In M'Culloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. ed. 579, the bank had been incorporated by Congress with powers to transact business of both a governmental and of a private character. The question which was decided was the authority of Congress to grant such charter. Without undertaking to restate the opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, it suffices for the purpose of the matter now before us to say that it was held that although Congress was not expressly given the power to confer the charter, authority to do so was to be implied as appropriate to carry out the powers expressly given. In reaching this conclusion it was further decided that to recognize the existence of the implied power was not at all in conflict with article 1, § 8, clause 18, of the Constitution, providing that Congress should have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," since that provision did not confine the implied authority to things which were indispensably necessary, but, on the contrary, gave legislative power to adopt every appropriate means to give effect to the powers expressly given. In terms it was pointed out that this broad authority was not stereotyped as of any particular time, but endured, thus furnishing a perpetual and living sanction to the legislative authority within the limits of a just discretion, enabling it to take into consideration the changing wants and demands of society and to adopt provisions appropriate to meet every situation which it was deemed required to be provided for. In fact, the rulings which we have stated were all summed up in the following passage, which ever since has been one of the principal tests by which to determine the scope of the implied power of Congress over subjects committed to its legislative authority:

"We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the national legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it, in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional." p. 421.

In Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 Wheat. 738, 6 L. ed. 204, where substantially the subject was presented in the same form in which it had been passed upon in M'Culloch v. Maryland, yielding to the request of counsel, the whole subject was re-examined and the previous doctrines restated and upheld. Considering more fully, however, the question of the possession by the corporation of private powers associated with its public authority, and meeting the contention that the two were separable, and the one, the public power, should be treated as within, and the other, the private, as without, the implied power of Congress, it was expressly held that the authority of Congress was to be ascertained by considering the bank as an entity possessing the rights and powers conferred upon it, and that the lawful power to create the bank and give it the attributes which were deemed essential could not be rendered unavailing by detaching particular powers and considering them isolatedly, and thus destroy the efficacy of the bank as a national instrument. The ruling in effect was that although a particular character of business might not be, when isolatedly considered, within the implied power of Congress, if such business was appropriate or relevant to the banking business, the implied power was to be tested by the right to create the bank and the authority to attach to it that which was relevant, in the judgment of Congress, to make the business of the bank successful. It was said: "Congress was of opinion that these faculties were necessary, to enable the bank to perform the services which are exacted from it, and for which it was created. This was certainly a question proper for the consideration of the national legislature." p. 864.

As the doctrines thus announced have been reiterated in a multitude of judicial decisions, and have been undeviatingly applied in legislative, and enforced in administrative, action, we come at once to state the case before us to see whether such doctrines dispose, without more, as a mere question of authority, of the subject under consideration.

Section 11(k) of the Act of Congress approved December 23, 1913, establishing the Federal Reserve Board (38 Stat. at L. 251, 262, chap. 6, Comp. Stat. 1916, §§ 9785, 9794), gives to that board authority "to grant by special permit to national banks applying therefor, when not in contravention of state or local law, the right to act as trustee, executor, administrator, or registrar of stocks and bonds under such rules and regulations as the said board may prescribe."

The First National Bank of Bay City, having obtained the certificate required, began the exercise of the powers stated. Thereupon certain trust companies which, under the laws of Michigan, had the authority to do the same character of business, petitioned the attorney general of the state to test the right of the national bank to use the functions, on the ground that its doing so was contrary to the laws of the state of Michigan, and that the action of the Federal Reserve Board, purporting to give authority, was in contravention of the Constitution of the United States. The attorney general then, on the relation of the trust companies, commenced in the supreme court of the state a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto to test the right of the corporation to exercise the functions. The bank, in defense, fully stated its Federal charter, the rights given by the act of Congress, and the action of the Federal Reserve Board taken thereunder. The attorney general demurred to this defense, first, because Congress had no power to confer the authority which was called in question; second, because if it had the power, it was without right to delegate to the Reserve Board the determination of when it should be used; and third, because the exercise of the powers was in contravention of the laws and authority of the state, and the Reserve Board, therefore, under the act, had no power to grant the certificate.

The case was heard by the full court. In an opinion of one judge, which, it would seem, was written before the opinion of the court was prepared, it was elaborately reasoned that the exercise by a national bank of the functions enumerated in the section of the act of Congress under consideration would be contrary to the laws of the state, and therefore the Reserve Board, under the terms of the act of Congress, had no power to authorize their exertion. The opinion of the court, however, fully examining the grounds thus stated and disagreeing with them, expressly decided that corporations were authorized by the state law to perform the functions in question, and that the mere fact that national banks were Federal corporations did not render them unfit to assume and perform such duties under the state law, because the mere difference existing between the general administrative rules governing national banks and state corporations afforded no ground for saying that it would be contrary to state law for national banks to exert the powers under consideration. The authority conferred by the act of Congress and the rights arising from the certificate from such point of view were therefore upheld. Looking at the subject, however, from a consideration of the legislative power of Congress in the light of the decisions in M'Culloch v. Maryland and Osborn v. Bank of United States, and recognizing that it had been settled beyond dispute that Congress had power to organize banks and endow them with functions both of a public and private character, and in the assumed further light of the rule that every reasonable intendment must be indulged in in favor of the constitutionality of a legislative power exercised, it was yet decided that Congress had no authority to confer the powers embraced in the section of the act under consideration, and hence that the section was void. The court, following its reference to M'Culloch v. Maryland and Osborn v. Bank of United States, and to passages in the opinions in those cases, upholding the rightful possession by the bank of both public functions and private banking attributes, stated the grounds which led it to conclude that the rulings in the decided cases were distinguishable and therefore not controlling. It said:

"But in the reasoning of the judges, in the opinions to which I have referred, I find, I think, a conclusive argument supporting the proposition that Congress has exceeded its constitutional powers in granting to banks the right to act as trustees, executors, and administrators. If for mere profit it can clothe this agency with the powers enumerated, it can give it the rights of a trading corporation, or a transportation company, or both. There is, as Judge Marshall points out, a natural connection between the business of banking and the carrying on of Federal fiscal operations. There is none, apparently, between such operations and the business of settling estates, or acting as the trustee of bondholders. This being so, there is in the legislation a direct invasion of the sovereignty of the state which controls not only the devolution of estates of deceased persons and the conducting of private business within the state, but as well the creation of corporations and the qualifications and duties of such as may engage in the business of acting as trustees, executors, and administrators. Such an invasion I think the court may declare and may prevent by its order operating upon the offending agency." [192 Mich. 653, 159 N. W. 339.]

But we are of opinion that the doctrine thus announced not only was wholly inadequate to distinguish the case before us from the rulings in M'Culloch v. Maryland and Osborn v. Bank of United States, but, on the contrary, directly conflicted with what was decided in those cases; that is to say, disregarded their authority so as to cause it to be our duty to reverse for the following reasons:

1. Because the opinion of the court, instead of testing the existence of the implied power to grant the particular functions in question by considering the bank as created by Congress as an entity, with all the functions and attributes conferred upon it, rested the determination as to such power upon a separation of the particular functions from the other attributes and functions of the bank, and ascertained the existence of the implied authority to confer them by considering them as segregated; that is, by disregarding their relation to the bank as component parts of its operations,—a doctrine which, as we have seen, was in the most express terms held to be unsound in both of the cases.

2. Because while, in the premise to the reasoning, the right of Congress was fully recognized to exercise its legislative judgment as to the necessity for creating the bank, including the scope and character of the public and private powers which should be given to it, in application the discretion of Congress was disregarded or set aside by exercising judicial discretion for the purpose of determining whether it was relevant or appropriate to give the bank the particular functions in question.

3. Because even under this mistaken view the conclusion that there was no ground for implying the power in Congress was erroneous because it was based on a mistaken standard, since, for the purpose of testing how far the functions in question which were conferred by the act of Congress on the bank were relevant to its business, or had any relation to discrimination by state legislation against banks created by Congress, it considered not the actual situation, that is, the condition of the state legislation, but an imaginary or nonexisting condition; that is, the assumption that, so far as the state power was concerned, the particular functions were in the state enjoyed only by individuals or corporations not coming at all, actually or potentially, in competition with national banks. And the far-reaching effect of this error becomes manifest when it is borne in mind that, plainly, the particular functions enumerated in the statute were conferred upon national banks because of the fact that they were enjoyed as the result of state legislation, by state corporations, rivals in a greater or less degree of national banks.

4. In view of the express ruling that the enjoyment of the powers in question by the national bank would not be in contravention of the state law, it follows that the reference of the court below to the state authority over the particular subjects which the statute deals with must have proceeded upon the erroneous assumption that, because a particular function was subject to be regulated by the state law, therefore Congress was without power to give a national bank the right to carry on such functions. But if this be what the statement signifies, the conflict between it and the rule settled in M'Culloch v. Maryland and Osborn v. Bank of United States is manifest. What those cases established was that although a business was of a private nature and subject to state regulation, if it was of such a character as to cause it to be incidental to the successful discharge by a bank chartered by Congress of its public functions, it was competent for Congress to give the bank the power to exercise such private business in co-operation with or as part of its public authority. Manifestly this excluded the power of the state in such case, although it might possess in a general sense authority to regulate such business, to use that authority to prohibit such business from being united by Congress with the banking function, since to do so would be but the exertion of state authority to prohibit Congress from exerting a power which, under the Constitution, it had a right to exercise. From this it must also follow that even although a business be of such a character that it is not inherently considered susceptible of being included by Congress in the powers conferred on national banks, that rule would cease to apply if, by state law, state banking corporations, trust companies, or others which, by reason of their business, are rivals or quasi rivals of national banks, are permitted to carry on such business. This must be, since the state may not by legislation create a condition as to a particular business which would bring about actual or potential competition with the business of national banks, and at the same time deny the power of Congress to meet such created condition by legislation appropriate to avoid the injury which otherwise would be suffered by the national agency. Of course, as the general subject of regulating the character of business just referred to is peculiarly within state administrative control, state regulations for the conduct of such business, if not discriminatory or so unreasonable as to justify the conclusion that they necessarily would so operate, would be controlling upon banks chartered by Congress when they came, in virtue of authority conferred upon them by Congress, to exert such particular powers. And these considerations clearly were in the legislative mind when it enacted the statute in question. This result would seem to be plain when it is observed (a) that the statute authorizes the exertion of the particular functions by national banks when not in contravention of the state law; that is, where the right to perform them is expressly given by the state law; or, what is equivalent, is deducible from the state law because that law has given the function to state banks or corporations whose business in a greater or less degree rivals that of national banks, thus engendering from the state law itself an implication of authority in Congress to do as to national banks that which the state law has done as to other corporations; and (b) that the statute subjects the right to exert the particular functions which it confers on national banks to the administrative authority of the Reserve Board, giving besides to that board power to adopt rules regulating the exercise of the functions conferred, thus affording the means of coordinating the functions when permitted to be discharged by national banks with the reasonable and nondiscriminating provisions of state law regulating their exercise as to state corporations,—the whole to the end that harmony and the concordant exercise of the national and state power might result.

Before passing to the question of procedure we think it necessary to do no more than say that a contention which was pressed in argument, and which it may be was indirectly referred to in the opinion of the court below, that the authority given by the section to the Reserve Board was void because conferring legislative power on that board, is so plainly adversely disposed of by many previous adjudications as to cause it to be necessary only to refer to them. Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 36 L. ed. 294, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 495; Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S. 470, 48 L. ed. 525, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 349; United States v. Grimaud, 220 U. S. 506, 55 L. ed. 563, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 480; Monongahela Bridge Co. v. United States, 216 U. S. 177, 54 L. ed. 435, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 356; Intermountain Rate Cases (United States v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co.) 234 U. S. 476, 58 L. ed. 1408, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 986.

The question of the competency of the procedure and the right to administer the remedy sought then remains. It involves a challenge of the right of the state attorney general to resort in a state court to proceedings in the nature of quo warranto to test the power of the corporation to exert the particular functions given by the act of Congress because they were inherently Federal in character, enjoyed by a Federal corporation, and susceptible only of being directly tested in a Federal court. Support for the challenge in argument is rested upon Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. 506, 16 L. ed. 169; Tarble's Case, 13 Wall. 397, 20 L. ed. 597; Van Reed v. People's Nat. Bank, 198 U. S. 554, 557, 49 L. ed. 1161, 1162, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 775, 3 Ann. Cas. 1154; State ex rel. Wilcox v. Curtis, 35 Conn. 374, 95 Am. Dec. 263. But, without inquiring into the merits of the doctrine upon which the proposition rests, we think when the contention is tested by a consideration of the subject-matter of this particular controversy it cannot be sustained. In other words, we are of opinion that, as the particular functions in question, by the express terms of the act of Congress, were given only "when not in contravention of state or local law," the state court was, if not expressly, at least impliedly, authorized by Congress to consider and pass upon the question whether the particular power was or was not in contravention of the state law, and we place our conclusion on that ground. We find no ambiguity in the text, but if it be that ambiguity is latent in the provision, a consideration of its purpose would dispel doubt; especially in view of the interpretation which we have given the statute, and the contrast between the clause governing the subject of the state law and the provision conferring administrative power on the Reserve Board. The nature of the subject dealt with adds cogency to this view, since that subject involves the action of state courts of probate in a universal sense, implying from its very nature the duty of such courts to pass upon the question, and the power of the court below, within the limits of state jurisdiction, to settle, so far as the state was concerned, the question for all such courts by one suit, thus avoiding the confusion which might arise in the entire system of state probate proceedings and the very serious injury to many classes of society which also might be occasioned. And our conclusion on this subject is fortified by the terms of § 57, chap. 106, 13 Stat. at L. 116, making controversies concerning national banks cognizable in state courts because of their intimate relation to many state laws and regulations, although, without the grant of the act of Congress, such controversies would have been Federal in character.

As it follows from what we have said that the court below erred in declaring the section of the act of Congress to be unconstitutional, the judgment must be reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

And it is so ordered.

Mr. Justice Van Devanter, dissenting:

I dissent from the conclusion that this proceeding could be brought and maintained in the state court. It is an information in the nature of a quo warranto against a Federal corporation,—a national bank. It calls in question the bank's right to exercise a privilege claimed under an act of Congress, the privilege, under the terms of the act, being conferred only when "not in contravention of the state or local law." The information was brought by the attorney general of the state in his own name, and charges that the bank's exercise of the privilege is "in contempt of the people of the state," by which it is meant, as the record discloses, first, that the exercise of the privilege by the bank is in contravention of the law of the state, and, second, that the act of Congress under which the privilege is claimed transcends the power of L.R.A.1918C.

Congress and is void. The state court dealt with both grounds. The first was overruled and the second sustained. The judgment rendered enjoins and excludes the bank from exercising the privilege.

The writ of quo warranto was a prerogative writ, and the modern proceeding by information is not different in that respect. When it is brought to exclude the exercise of a franchise, privilege, or power claimed under the United States, it can only be brought in the name of the United States and by its representative, or in such other mode as it may have sanctioned. Wallace v. Anderson, 5 Wheat. 291, 5 L. ed. 91; Nebraska v. Lockwood, 3 Wall. 236, 18 L. ed. 47; Newman v. United States, 238 U. S. 537, 59 L. ed. 1446, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 881. As is said in the Lockwood Case: "The right to institute such proceedings is inherently in the government of the nation." This is particularly true of national banks, for they not only derive all their powers from the United States, but are instrumentalities created by it for a public purpose, and "are not to be interfered with by state legislative or judicial action, except so far as the lawmaking power of the government may permit." Davis v. Elmira Sav. Bank, 161 U. S. 275, 283, 40 L. ed. 700, 701, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 502; Van Reed v. People's Nat. Bank, 198 U. S. 554, 557, 49 L. ed. 1161, 1162, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 775, 3 Ann. Cas. 1154. Indeed, they are upon much the same plane as are officers of the United States, because their conduct can only be controlled by the power that created them. M'Clung v. Silliman, 6 Wheat. 598, 605, 5 L. ed. 340, 342. If it were otherwise, the supremacy of the United States and of its Constitution and laws would be seriously imperiled. Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. 506, 16 L. ed. 169; Tarble's Case, 13 Wall. 398, 20 L. ed. 597; Tennessee v. Davis, 100 U. S. 257, 25 L. ed. 648; State ex rel. Wilcox v. Curtis, 35 Conn. 374, 95 Am. Dec. 263.

Thus much, as I understand it, is conceded in this court's opinion, the conclusion that the state court could entertain the information and proceed to judgment thereon, as was done, being rested upon an implied authorization by Congress. This authorization is thought to be found in the provision stating that the privilege claimed is given only "when not in contravention of state or local law," and in the provision in the Act of June 3, 1864, chap. 106, § 57, 13 Stat. at L. 116, now in Rev. Stat. § 5198, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 9759, which makes suits against national banks cognizable in certain state courts. I do not find any such authorization in either provision.

The first does no more than to withhold the privilege in question from national banks located in states whose laws are opposed to or not in harmony with the possession and exercise of such a privilege on the part of the banks. It says nothing about judicial proceedings,—nothing about who shall bring them or where they shall be brought. There is in it no suggestion that quo warranto proceedings were in the mind of Congress. Had there been a purpose to do anything so unusual as to authorize a state officer to institute and conduct such a proceeding in a state court against a Federal corporation, is it not reasonable to believe that Congress would have given expression to that purpose? As before indicated, it said nothing upon the point,—just as it would have done had no such purpose been in mind. But if the words “when not in contravention of state or local law” could be regarded as giving any warrant for a quo warranto proceeding by a state officer in a state court, I should say they would do no more than to permit such a proceeding to determine whether the privilege was in contravention of the state law. There is nothing in them which points even remotely to a purpose to sanction a proceeding to determine the power of Congress under the Constitution to clothe a national bank with the privilege indicated. That would be without any precedent in the legislation relating to Federal corporations, and I submit that it is most improbable that Congress either did or would entertain such a purpose.

The provision cited from the Act of 1864 has been in the statutes for fifty-three years, and no one seems ever to have thought until now that it was intended to authorize a proceeding such as this against a national bank. I think its words do not fairly lend themselves to that purpose. They have hitherto been regarded, and in practice treated, as referring to ordinary suits such as may be conveniently prosecuted against a bank in its home town and county. Besides, the terms of the provision show that it can have no application here. After providing for suing a national bank in the Federal or territorial court of the district in which it is established, the provision adds, “or in any state, county or municipal court in the county or city in which said association is located.” This bank, as the record discloses, is located in Bay City, Bay county. The proceeding was begun and had in the supreme court of the state at the capital, which is Lansing, Ingham county. Therefore the provision can give no support to the proceeding.

For these reasons I think the judgment should be reversed, with a direction to dismiss the information for want of jurisdiction.

Mr. Justice Day authorizes me to say that he concurs in this dissent.

Fowler v. Fowler, — Okla. —, L.R.A. 1917C, 89, 161 Pac. 227.

Holcomb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On April 23, 1914, a decree of divorce was entered in the superior court of Whatcom county upon the complaint of appellant, dissolving the marriage theretofore existing between the parties and awarding the custody of the two children, aged respectively seven years and five years, to the respondent, the mother, on account of their tender ages. The court awarded to appellant a tract of unimproved, nonproducing land, containing about 80 acres, near Blaine, and awarded to respondent two lots with a dwelling thereon in Blaine, and required appellant to pay the taxes and assessments upon the lots, and further provided that appellant should pay the sum of $15 per month for the support of the minor children, beginning the first Saturday in May, 1914.

Appellant paid the taxes and assessments upon the property awarded to respondent as required by the decree, and also made the payments of $15 per month up to and including the payment of September, 1915, but defaulted in the payments for October, November, and December, 1915. On December 7, 1915, respondent secured an order requiring appellant to appear on January 11, 1916, and show cause why he should not be punished for contempt by reason of his failure to make such overdue payments. On January 11, 1916, appellant appeared personally without counsel. After hearing the evidence the court continued the matter until February 7, 1916, and ordered appellant to pay the sum of $25 to respondent on or before February 7th, and ordered further that he pay to respondent on the first Saturday of each month the sum of $5 in addition to the regular instalments until the overdue instalments were paid, and that he pay a doctor's bill of $28.50 incurred for medical treatment of the minor children, and the costs of the hearing, taxed at $18.80, on or before the first Saturday in March, 1916. The matter was then continued from time to time upon motion, and appellant at various times introduced numerous affidavits to substantiate his contention that he was unable to make the payments ordered by the court. On December 18, 1916, the court entered the order adjudging appellant guilty of contempt and committing him to jail in default of the payments in arrears. At that time he was in arrears $125, having paid $90 to apply on the overdue instalments subsequent to the date of the original hearing.

The affidavit of the respondent initiating the contempt proceeding alleged, among other things, that appellant is a strong, able-bodied man, and able to earn good wages in various employments. The affidavits presented by appellant at the several hearings, among them many of entirely disinterested persons, establish the facts that appellant is a crab fisherman and unskilled at any other labor or employment; that he is industrious, sober, and extremely economical, honest, and generally pays all of his debts and obligations; that during the preceding two years crab fishing had been exceedingly unprofitable, and crab fishermen had been unable to make much, if anything, more than their expenses; that during such time appellant had been unable to clothe himself properly and had not proper shoes or other clothing; that, notwithstanding this, he had made some small payments of the amounts ordered to be paid for his children. It was shown that crab fishing had been rendered unprofitable during the preceding two years by reason of the occurrence of unusual winds, which prevented him and other crab fishermen from fishing their traps as often as usual, and thus prevented obtaining the usual catch; that during the closed season appellant endeavored to secure other work than crab fishing and was promised work in a cannery at Blaine, but failed to secure the work on account of the light run of salmon during the salmon fishing season; that he obtained some work in British Columbia, but was compelled to relinquish it on account of the sickness and death of his father, and upon his return to the place of work was unable to secure further work; and in general it seems to be shown beyond any doubt that he made every effort to secure employment and to earn an income during the crab fishing season to the best of his ability.

The only circumstance that appears to indicate a contumacious disposition concerning the payment of the sums ordered for his children is that he sold to his brother, for crab fishing gear valued at $400, the 80 acres of land awarded to him as separate property, which a witness valued at $1,600, subject to some delinquent taxes, the amount of which was not shown. This land, however, was unimproved and produced no income, and his disposition thereof as shown may have been as much in good faith with the intention of procuring sufficient gear to increase his income from crab fishing, as in bad faith with the intention to defeat his obligations toward his minor children.

The trial court indicated that, being convinced that appellant was a strong, able-bodied man and able to work (which is not denied), and that work is in demand and mills are running, he should abandon crab fishing and obtain other work and provide for his children. There is no doubt, and appellant conceded, that he was under a strong moral as well as legal obligation to provide for his children. But, where the inability to pay is bona fide, a court cannot compel the delinquent father to learn a new trade or acquire a profession or find employment, and thus derive the means wherewith to pay the alimony allotted. 1 R. C. L. 962. The same situation might well have existed in the following cases decided by this court: Holcomb v. Holcomb, 53 Wash. 611, 102 Pac. 653; Boyle v. Boyle, 74 Wash. 529, 133 Pac. 1009; Crombie v. Crombie, 88 Wash. 520, 153 Pac. 306. In none of those cases did the court require the defaulting husband or father to abandon his regular, and search for a new, occupation. The condition shown by appellant in this case is a more precarious one than that shown in either the Holcomb or the Crombie Case.

We are of the opinion that the appellant showed by a great preponderance of facts his inability to make the payments during the time he was in default and to comply with the order at the time it was made, and purged himself of any wilful and contumacious intention to avoid the payment of the money. His inability is real, but apparently temporary. His obligations under the decree will continue and accumulate until his actual ability to pay recurs. It is only where the inability is wilfully brought about by himself, with intent to avoid payment, that the refusal to pay becomes contumacious, and such inability would not purge him of contempt. But imprisonment certainly should not be ordered when it appears that the default is the result of honest inability to pay on account of business misfortunes, lack of earning ability, or other fortuitous circumstances which are not the fault of the party. That is the spirit of our decided cases.

Order reversed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

ALABAMA CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

ALABAMA PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION et al.

(— Ala. —, 76 So. 862.)

Carrier — use of tracks under license — compulsory service.

A railroad company which has a mere license to use the tracks of a lumber company cannot be compelled to put in sidings to serve rivals of the track owner, although a provision in the contract forbidding it to render service to such rivals is void.

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Montgomery County sustaining a demurrer to a bill filed to enjoin the defendant commission from further enforcing its order requiring the construction of a sidetrack by complainant. Reversed.

Statement by Mayfield, J.:

Appellant is a common carrier by rail. It owns and operates a railroad from Jas-

Note.—The power to compel a railroad to build, maintain, or connect with sidetrack for the accommodation of shippers is discussed in the notes to State ex rel. Mt. Hope Coal Co. v. White Oak R. Co. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1013; McInnis v. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. L.R.A.1915E, 682; and State ex rel. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Public Service Commission, L.R.A.1918B, 786. L.R.A.1918C.

per, Alabama, to Manchester, Alabama, a distance of 6 miles. The Manchester Sawmill Company, a purely private corporation engaged in the lumber business, owns and operates a logging road which extends several miles north of Manchester and into a belt of pine timber which is being cut and manufactured into lumber by the sawmill company, and over said logging road this purely private company transports its logs and its manufactured lumber to and from its mills,—its logs from the forest to its mills situate on said road, and its lumber from the mills to Manchester, and thence to other markets over lines of public service corporations.

About April 10, 1915, appellant, a public service corporation, and the sawmill company, entered into a contract whereby appellant acquired the license or right to operate its trains and service over the logging road, for the purpose of carrying freight and passengers for hire, but did not acquire the right to haul or transport pine logs or pine lumber over such logging road, except for its own use. The sawmill company, however, retained the paramount right to the use of the tracks, to the end that it should not be delayed in the transaction of its own business. The sawmill company also retained or reserved the right to take up the track, or change the location thereof, at its will or pleasure, and by the contract the sawmill company was under no duty to keep the logging road in such repair as to be suitable for operating trains thereon. Appellant, however, had the right, under certain conditions, to repair and keep up, and, under certain other conditions, to purchase, the track and the rights of the sawmill company. Appellant also acquired the right to use a Y of the logging company, and to erect upon the property of the sawmill company switches, sidetracks, and platforms for loading purposes, which might be necessary to the conduct of its business as a common carrier, but subject to the reasonable regulations of the sawmill company.

About October 27, 1916, while appellant was thus using the logging road, M. Aaron and J. H. McNeal, a partnership, applied to the Alabama Public Service Commission to require appellant to put in a sidetrack on the logging road of the sawmill company, for the use of the partnership in the transporting of pine lumber and other shipments through the agency of appellant as a common carrier. A hearing was had before the commission, and appellant was ordered to proceed to put in such sidetrack. Appellant notified the sawmill company of the proceedings, and of the order requiring the construction of the sidetrack, and the sawmill company would not consent to the construction of the sidetrack. To the notice the sawmill company made this reply:

December 7, 1916.

Mr. W. C. Davis,
Jasper, Alabama.

Dear Sir:—

Aaron & McNeal v. Ala. Central R. R. Co.

Replying to your notice that the Alabama Railroad Commission has ordered the Alabama Central Railroad to put in a sidetrack for Aaron & McNeal's sawmill on the logging road of the Manchester Sawmills, we beg to say, in behalf of the Manchester Sawmills, that the logging road, together with the right of way upon which it is built, belongs to them; that it is purely a private industry, and not a common carrier, and that it does not intend, at its expense, to furnish a logging road for its competitors in the lumber business; and that it will not permit the Alabama Central to build any spur track off of its logging road for the accommodation of McNeal & Aaron.

The Manchester Sawmills will resist to the full extent of the law any effort to build such a track. They will not only have any persons attempting to do so arrested for trespass, but will take such forcible action as it is advised it has power to take, to prevent the construction of such a track, and, if such a track is surreptitiously built, they will promptly tear the same out. We are writing you so that you may fully understand that the Manchester Sawmills will under no conditions permit the Alabama Central to build a switch or sidetrack, as contemplated, for the Aaron & McNeal Sawmill, unless they are required, L.R.A.1918C.

by the highest court to which they can go, to do so.

We hope this statement will leave no misunderstanding of their attitude.

Very sincerely,
JHBjr. [Signed] Bankhead & Bankhead.

Appellant then filed this its bill in the circuit court of Montgomery county, against the members of the Public Service Commission, to enjoin them from further enforcing the order requiring the construction of the sidetrack as prayed in the petition, and as ordered to be done by the commission. The commission, or its members, demurred to the bill for want of equity. The trial court sustained the demurrer, and from its decree in that behalf appellant prosecutes this appeal.

Mr. W. C. Davis for appellant.

Messrs. W. L. Martin, Attorney General, and Lawrence E. Brown, Assistant Attorney General, for appellee.

Mayfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If it be conceded that the contract between appellant and the sawmill company, for the use of the logging track of the latter by the former as a common carrier, is void by reason of the stipulation that the carrier should not haul pine logs or pine lumber over the logging road, or for other reasons, this would not authorize the Public Service Commission to require appellant to violate its void agreement, or to trespass upon, or use without authority, the property of the logging company. The only right, title or interest which appellant has in or to the logging road depends solely upon contract, and if the contract is void, then appellant has no rights whatever,—has no right to the use of the logging road for any purpose. While the contract authorizes appellant to purchase the logging road, appellant has never exercised this option; and neither the commission nor the courts can compel it to exercise the option. Neither the commission nor the courts have the power to make or alter contracts between parties. If the carrier owned or controlled the logging road under a valid lease, then the commission could compel it to serve all the public of the same class alike, and to provide facilities reasonably adequate to accommodate shippers desiring service of the carrier. In such cases, where the carrier owns, or, by lease or otherwise, has the control of, the tracks and lines over which it operates its trains, it can be required to serve all customers of the same class on equal terms, and thus avoid discriminations; and the carrier cannot, by contract with some of its customers or with third parties, exempt or excuse itself from thus treating all alike, and thus discharging its duties as common carrier to the public. But where the carrier does not own or control the track which it uses, but uses the same as a mere licensee, or under an agreement such as is found in this case, the commission or the courts cannot authorize, much less compel, the carrier, thus operating under a mere license, to improve or change the main lines, sidetracks, or the loading facilities of the line over which it is so operating without right of control, but with the mere right to repair and keep up the lines, as in this case.

This distinction is well pointed out by the courts, state and Federal, in the cases of Oman v. Bedford-Bowling Green Stone Co. 67 C. C. A. 190, 134 Fed. 64, and (C. C.) 134 Fed. 441, and 115 Ky. 369, 73 S. W. 1038. The holdings in these cases, which are here applicable, are well stated in headnotes in the report of the cases, as follows:

"2. Railroads—private switches—use for public business. Persons who have no property rights in a private switch over another's land cannot compel the latter to permit the railroad to receive and ship their freight over the switch to the railroad's own track.

"3. Same—sale of switch—right of stranger to complain. A contract by which a railroad operates, in its capacity as common carrier, a switch over private property, may be abrogated at will by the railroad and the owner of the property, and the switch may be sold to the latter regardless of the motives of the parties to the contract in so doing; and a stranger to the contract, who is interested in the maintenance of the switch by the railroad as a carrier, cannot complain of the contract as fraudulent merely because the purchase price was not paid in cash, but promissory notes were given therefor."

"5. Carriers—duty to receive freight—private switches. A common carrier cannot be required to receive freight on or along a private switch, but its duty in that regard is confined and limited to its own depots or shipping and receiving points."

(C. C.) 134 Fed. 441.

If the logging road in question were a public highway, or a railroad in which the public had acquired rights by condemnation proceedings or by dedication to a public use, and its owners or those who had acquired control of it were common carriers, or were engaged in the business of a public service, then the Public Service Commission or the courts, when authorized by the legislature, could regulate and control the use of the railroad so as to serve the public, and do so without discrimination. Here, however, the road involved is a private road, and not a public one, and those who own, and have the exclusive control of it are private individuals or corporations who have merely consented or agreed that appellant, a public service corporation, may use it under certain restrictions and regulations. It may be, as we have said, that this contract or agreement is void, because against public policy; but, if so, it cannot be relieved against by compelling the parties to make a new contract, nor by compelling them to so modify it as to make it legal and binding on both parties. Neither the Public Service Commission nor the courts possess such powers. While the common carrier is so using this private road under a void contract, it may be liable as for damages for unwarranted discriminations, and its illegal contract might not excuse or justify for such discriminations; yet the common carrier has no right to put in switches or sidetracks on this logging road without the consent of its owners, and, if such were placed, the owners would have the absolute right to remove them, and even the main line, and to wholly prevent the use of the road by appellant or by the public. Surely the Public Service Commission nor the courts ought to compel a common carrier to use or improve private property in a way or manner in which it has no right so to use it, and could not voluntarily use it.

It may be (but as to this we do not decide) that, if the proceeding to require the construction of the sidetrack were against the logging company, this decision would be different,—that the use to which the logging company has put its private road, or allowed it to be put, in virtue of our Constitution and statutes, would be held to have converted the private road into a public one, and brought it within the jurisdiction of the Public Service Commission. But this question is not before us; there has been no proceeding against the logging company; it has had no opportunity of being heard, and is not even a party to this bill.

Here, however, the only party who would have a right to voluntarily construct, or authorize the construction of, the sidetrack, is not before the court, and was not before the commission. Conceding that the facts stated in the bill are true,—and on demurrer the court must treat them so to be,—appellant not only has no right to do what the commission has ordered it to do, but is under contract or agreement not to do that identical thing; and, should it obey the commission's order, it would forfeit all right to use any part of the logging road, and be subject to suit for damages by the owners of the road, and if it built the sidetrack voluntarily it would be a trespasser.

Unquestionably, the commission has no power to compel appellant to be a trespasser, nor to exempt appellant from liability, should it build the sidetrack, as for a trespass. Nor would the commission's order to build the sidetrack have the effect to make its construction rightful and lawful. If appellant owned or had the control of the logging road which it was so using, it could avoid being a trespasser in constructing the sidetrack by purchasing the land; but it neither owns nor controls the logging road to the extent that it would have the right to condemn to such end. If it had the right and power to condemn, then it is possible that it might be compelled to condemn; but having no such right to condemn the particular land in question for a sidetrack to be used in connection with the logging road, it ought not to be compelled to take it by force, nor to condemn it.

There is no contention that it should build a sidetrack or spur from the point in question to its own line of road, and no such order has been sought or made. The bill shows that the only right it has to operate its trains over the logging road rests solely upon a contract, which contract not only fails to authorize it to do what the commission directs it to do, on and with the property of the logging road, but expressly prohibits it from doing; and that if appellant voluntarily, or by force of the act and order of the commission, does the acts so required of it, it thereby forfeits all its rights under the contract, and subjects itself to an action for damages.

To this the answer is made that such provisions of the contract are void as against public policy, and that they are not binding upon the parties or the public. This may be true; but, if so, the fact confers no right or power upon the commission or the courts to make a new contract or to modify the one made in material respects, to the extent that one party thereto would not have made the modified contract originally. In other words, the contract cannot be enforced unless it be valid and binding. Moreover, to enforce the order of the commission would violate the contract instead of enforcing it as made.

In speaking of void leases of one road, to operate that of another, the law is thus stated by Mr. Elliott: "It is evident that it may be liable for its torts in operating the road, and yet not bound to perform the obligations which the law requires the lessor to perform. If the lease is void, it neither confers a right nor creates a duty. In a well-reasoned opinion it was adjudged that, where a lease was executed without authority, the lessee could not be compelled to operate the leased road, and that mandamus would not lie." 1 Elliott, Railroads, 2d ed. § 457.

In a note the author cites and quotes from the case as follows: "People ex rel. Van Dyke v. Colorado C. R. Co. (C. C.) 42 Fed. 638. In the course of the opinion Caldwell, J., said: 'As the relator and the respondents are agreed that the lease was void, that ends the case as to the Union Pacific Railroad Company; for, if the lease is void, it imposes no obligation on the Union Pacific Railroad Company to operate the road.' The decision was placed on the ground that the lease was void, for it was affirmed that mandamus lies where there is a duty to operate a railroad. The court cited State v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 7 Neb. 357; Com. v. Fitchburg R. Co. 12 Gray, 180." Id., note to § 457.

These authorities are a complete answer to the question of the right of the commission to compel appellant to operate under a void lease or contract.

The case in hand is distinguishable from the cases relied upon by appellees and by the trial court. In Agee's Case, 142 Ala. 353, 37 So. 680, it was merely held that, while a common carrier is using a spur or sidetrack in its business as a common carrier, it will not be allowed to discriminate between customers of the same class, nor even by contract with other parties could it justify its discrimination.

The Oman Case, 115 Ky. 369, 73 S. W. 1038, has heretofore been shown not to be applicable to a case like this. The other cases relied upon, reported in State ex rel. Ellis v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 52 Fla. 646, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 506, 41 So. 705; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Standard Lumber Co. 98 C. C. A. 81, 174 Fed. 107, and Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Pittsburg & K. Coal Co. 111 Ky. 960, 55 L.R.A. 601, 98 Am. St. Rep. 447, 64 S. W. 969, are distinguishable, because there the common carrier either owned or controlled the line of road and sidetracks in question. Here appellant does not own the main line of the logging road, not even the ties and the rails, much less the right of way, and has no control thereof, except to run its trains thereover, and to repair the same strictly for the purposes and under the rights acquired by its contract. If its contract is valid, it has agreed not to do what the commission requires it to do. If its contract is void, it has no right to use the logging road for any purpose, much less to put in or use a sidetrack on the right of way of the logging road. While under the contract it has the option to buy the logging road, the courts cannot compel it to exercise the option. If the facts averred in the bill are true, it would be utterly useless to compel appellant to put in a sidetrack, for the reason that the logging company, who own the land and the road, would not only remove it, but also the main track at that point, and absolutely prevent its use by appellant for the purposes intended by the order.

It therefore follows that the trial court was in error in sustaining the demurrers to the bill, but should have overruled them. Reversed, rendered, and remanded.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

ROBERT W. SIMMS, Plff. in Err.,
v.

FLORENCE KENNEDY.

(— Fla. —, 76 So. 739.)

Landlord and tenant — injury to stranger — liability.

1. A tenant or occupant of premises having the entire control thereof is, so far as third persons are concerned, the owner. He is therefore usually deemed to be prima facie liable for all injuries to third persons occasioned by the condition of the demised premises.

For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, III. c, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — liability of landlord.

2. A lessor landlord may be liable to third persons for injuries caused by defects in leased premises during the term of the lease, when the defect in or condition of the premises at the time of the lease was a violation of law, or was in the nature of a nuisance existing or incipient because of negligent construction or otherwise, or when the lessor has entire or partial control of the premises, or is required by law or undertakes to keep or to assist in keeping the premises in repair, or where his negligence or participation is a proximate cause of the injury. Liability of the lessor may also flow from special circumstances or from applicable provisions of law.

For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, III. c, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — liability for defects.

3. Prima facie where the lessee is in entire possession, occupancy, and control of the premises under a lease, and the premises were in good condition when leased, the lessor is not liable in damages for injuries to third persons caused by defects in the premises.

Headnotes by WHITFIELD, J.

L. 409; 1 Thomp. Neg. §§ 1313, 1314.

Whitfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant in error brought an action against Robert W. Simms to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by her as she passed along the sidewalk on a public street in Jacksonville, Florida, by the falling of a part of an awning overhanging the sidewalk and attached to a building belonging to Simms, but occupied by another person under a lease from Simms. The first count of the declaration alleges, in effect, that on November 11, 1914, the defendant "was the owner of a certain building and metal awning attached thereto and being a part thereof, and extending over and above the public sidewalk in front and to the west side of the said building, situated on the northeast corner of Bay and Hogan streets, in the city of Jacksonville, county and state aforesaid; that the defendant failed to keep the said awning in the proper repair, as he was bound to do, but negligently and carelessly allowed it, the said awning, to remain broken, in unrepair, and in a dangerous condition to persons passing thereunder; that on the day aforesaid plaintiff was a pedestrian walking along the said public sidewalk, in front of said building, as she had a right to do, and under the said awning, and a piece of the said awning fell upon the said plaintiff with great force and violence, whereby the plaintiff was" injured as alleged.

The second count alleges that the defendant was the owner of the building "occupied at the present time by Levy's store," and also of a "certain metal awning attached to and being a part of the said building, and extending over and above the public sidewalk in front and to the west side of the said building; that the said awning was broken and in a dangerous condition for the safety of persons passing along said public sidewalk, of which fact defendant well knew; that on the day aforesaid plaintiff was passing along said sidewalk and under the said awning, and by no fault of hers a piece of the said awning fell with great force and violence onto and against the said plaintiff, whereby she was thrown or knocked to the said sidewalk" and injured as stated.

A plea of not guilty and two special pleas were filed, the special pleas being stricken on motion. At the trial the defendant offered the following pleas: "That prior to the happening of the alleged accident he had leased the said building described in the declaration, owned by him and located at the northeast corner of Bay and Hogan streets, in the city of Jacksonville, Duval county, Florida, to one B. S. Levy, and by the terms of said leases the said B. S. Levy was to make every and all repairs of every kind and character to said building; that pursuant to the leases to the said B. S. Levy, and before the happening of the alleged accident which is the subject of this suit, the said B. S. Levy had gone into possession and taken control of said building, and that at the time of the said B. S. Levy going into possession of said building, the said building and every part thereof, and the part complained of in plaintiff's declaration, were in good repair and condition; and that at the time of the happening of said alleged accident the said B. S. Levy was in actual and exclusive possession, occupancy, and control of said building under the terms of said leases, and had been in possession and control of said building for, to wit, more than two years prior thereto. And for a second additional plea the defendant says that prior to the happening of the alleged accident he had leased said building described in the declaration, owned by him and located at the northeast corner of Bay and Hogan streets, in the city of Jacksonville, Duval county, Florida, to one B. S. Levy; that pursuant to the leases to the said B. S. Levy, and before the happening of the alleged accident which is the subject of this suit, the said B. S. Levy had gone into possession and taken control of said building, and that at the time of the said B. S. Levy going into possession of said building, the said building and every part thereof, and the part complained of in plaintiff's declaration, were in good repair and condition; and that at the time of the happening of said alleged accident the said B. S. Levy was in actual and exclusive possession, occupancy, and control of said building, and had been in possession and control of said building for, to wit, more than two years prior thereto."

The court refused to permit the pleas to be filed, to which the defendant excepted. Verdict and judgment were rendered for the plaintiff, and the defendant took writ of error.

The trial judge certifies that the "bill of exceptions contains only so much and such parts of the evidence as are necessary to enable the appellate court to properly review the rulings of the trial court mentioned in the assignment of errors in the above case."

If, under the circumstances stated in the quoted additional special pleas, the defendant is not liable, there was harmful error in refusing to permit the pleas to be filed at the trial. The court had, on the ground that it "could not avail the defendant," stricken a special plea averring that the defendant was not in possession or control of the building, but that the same had been leased for a term of years to B. S. Levy, and was in the care, custody, and control of B. S. Levy, the lease not yet having expired; and the court refused to admit in evidence the leases referred to in the pleas. Such pleas were manifestly designed to explain the character of the occupancy of the building "by Levy's store," as alleged in the second count of the declaration.

It is obvious from the several rulings made that the trial court held defendant to be liable even though the building was in the possession, custody, and control of another under a lease which required the lessee to make necessary repairs to the building during the period of the lease, the lessor having under the lease no right to possession or control of the building.

In King v. Cooney-Eckstein Co. 66 Fla. 246, 63 So. 659, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 163, where the action was against the lessees of a wharf to recover for personal injuries sustained by reason of a defect in the wharf, it is said: "Both the lessor and the lessee may be liable under certain circumstances, and that prima facie the liability rests primarily upon the one in actual occupancy and control of the premises."

A tenant or occupant of premises having the entire control thereof is, so far as third persons are concerned, the owner. He is therefore usually deemed to be prima facie liable for all injuries to third persons occasioned by the condition of the demised premises. 16 R. C. L. 1063, 1095; Nelson v. Liverpool Brewery Co. L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 311, 46 L. J. C. P. N. S. 675, 25 Week. Rep. 877.

A lessor landlord may be liable to third persons for injuries caused by defects in leased premises during the term of the lease, when the defect in or condition of the premises at the time of the lease was a violation of law, or was in the nature of a nuisance existing or incipient because of negligent construction or otherwise, or when the lessor has entire or partial control of the premises, or is required by law or undertakes to keep or to assist in keeping the premises in repair, or where his negligence or participation is a proximate cause of the injury. Liability of the lessor may also flow from special circumstances or from applicable provisions of law.

But prima facie where the lessee is in entire possession, occupancy, and control of the premises under a lease, and the premises were in good condition when leased, the lessor is not liable in damages for injuries to third persons caused by defects in the premises. And where an action for damages is brought against the lessor, he may plead specifically the lease to and the possession, occupancy, and control of the premises by another, in bar of the action, in each case setting up the facts affording the bar. Law, 2d ed. 240; Hett v. Janzen, 22 Ont. Rep. 414; 15 Eng. Rul. Cas. 335.

The proffered pleas aver that prior to the alleged injury the defendant had leased the building to B. S. Levy; that by the terms of the leases the lessee was to make every and all repairs of every kind and character to said building; that pursuant to the leases and before the alleged injury the said B. S. Levy had gone into possession and taken the control of said building; that at the time the lessee took possession the building and every part thereof, and the part complained of, were in good repair and condition; that at the time of the alleged injury the said B. S. Levy was in actual and exclusive possession, occupancy, and control of said building under the terms of the leases, and had been in possession and control of said building for more than two years.

These pleas tendered an issue that, if sustained, would have been a defense to the action, and permission to file them should have been allowed.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial awarded.

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the District Court for St. Louis County overruling demurrers to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's husband, alleged to have been caused by the wrongful acts or omissions of the defendants. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Francis H. De Groat and Brown & Guesmer, for appellants:

The obligation of the landlord being imposed by contract only, and the alleged breach of duty being the violation of an obligation imposed by contract, and not by law, and there being no tort liability, there is presented a state of facts not reached by § 8175 of the statute.

Bunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants demurred separately to the complaint on the ground that the facts stated did not constitute a cause of action. Both demurrers were overruled, and, the court certifying that the questions presented were in its opinion important and doubtful, each defendant appealed from the order overruling his demurrer.

Plaintiff is the widow and administratrix of the estate of Edward E. Keiper, deceased, and brings the action under Gen. Stat. 1913, § 8175, to recover damages for his death on the theory that it was caused by the wrongful acts or omissions of the defendants. The allegations of the complaint which are essential to an understanding of the questions involved may be stated as follows:

Defendant A. R. Anderson was the owner of a certain store building in Minneapolis. March 14, 1914, he leased the premises to Edward E. Keiper, for the term of one year, for use as a drug store. By the terms of the lease the lessor agreed "to keep said premises heated to a comfortable and proper temperature from October to April of each year, inclusive." The lessor maintained a heating plant in the basement of the building; defendant Arthur W. Anderson was in charge of the heating plant, as the agent of the lessor. Keiper went into possession of the store. From December 27, 1915, to January 14, 1916, the weather was intensely cold. Notwithstanding the terms of the lease, and their duties and obligations in the premises, the defendants "negligently and carelessly failed to properly attend to the heating plant," failed to keep the same in a good working condition and free from obstructions, failed to keep fuel in the same, and negligently allowed the fire in said furnace to go out or to get so low as to allow the premises to become cold and dangerous as to the occupancy thereof by the tenant and his licensees. This condition is alleged to have existed during the last days of December; on the 30th plaintiff contracted a severe cold, became ill, and was obliged to remain at his home for several days. On January 3d, he returned to work at the store, relying upon promises of the defendants to do better. He remained there until January 11th, when defendants carelessly and negligently allowed the heating plant to become cold for lack of fuel, causing the premises to become so cold that Keiper became ill, repaired to his bed, and died June 24, 1916, of the illness so acquired. It is unnecessary to further state the allegations of the complaint, except to say that negligence and carelessness on the part of the defendants are frequently alleged as the cause of Keiper's death.

Defendants claim that the action will not lie because it is on contract, not in tort, and because the statutory action to recover for death caused by wrongful act or omission can be maintained only when the cause of action is in tort.

Had Keiper survived, his cause of action would have been for breach of the contract to heat the premises, as proof of the contract would have been necessary to create any cause of action. This is settled in this state. Whittaker v. Collins, 34 Minn. 299, 57 Am. Rep. 55, 25 N. W. 632; Sargent v. Mason, 101 Minn. 319, 112 N. W. 255; East Grand Forks v. Steele, 121 Minn. 296, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 205, 141 N. W. 181, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 720; Finch v. Bursheim, 122 Minn. 152, 142 N. W. 143; Glidden v. Goodfellow, 124 Minn. 101, L.R.A.1916F, 1073, 144 N. W. 428.

It is just as true that the present action is based on the contract; there could be no recovery except for the contract. Though negligence or wrongdoing be alleged, the action is founded on contract, and therefore classed as one, in substance, on the contract. Whittaker v. Collins, supra. In the cases cited it was necessary to call the action either one in tort or one on contract in order to decide which of two rules applied; in Whittaker v. Collins, supra, whether it was necessary to join all parties jointly liable; in Sargent v. Mason and East Grand Forks v. Steele, what the proper measure of damages was; in Finch v. Bursheim, what Statute of Limitations applied. Of these cases perhaps Sargent v. Mason is most directly in point, as that action was based on the failure of a landlord to perform his contract to heat the leased premises. This court granted a new trial because the trial court gave the jury the rule of damages applying to torts instead of that applying to breach of contract.

All the numerous allegations of negligence and wrongdoing in the complaint before us come to but one point, the failure of the landlord to heat the premises as he had agreed to do. The gist of the action is the breach of the contract, and, as said in Whittaker v. Collins, supra: "It is in substance, whatever may be the form of pleading, an action on the contract." The cases of Barron v. Liedloff, 95 Minn. 474, 104 N. W. 289; Good v. Von Hemert, 114 Minn. 393, 131 N. W. 466; and Glidden v. Goodfellow, 124 Minn. 101, L.R.A.1916F, 1073, 144 N. W. 428, are not in conflict with this view. There was no contract relation in those cases between the injured person and the landlord. In the Barron Case the plaintiff was sublessee of the tenant, in the Good Case a member of his family, and in the Glidden Case an employee. The liability of the landlord was in each case based on his negligence. See note to Dustin v. Curtis, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 504.

How far is this decisive of the question whether the complaint shows that the death of plaintiff's intestate was caused by the "wrongful act or omission" of defendants? Counsel for defendants insist that no action for death by wrongful act will lie unless the wrongful act or omission is a tort, negligence unconnected with contract. They say that an act or omission is not wrongful—does not constitute negligence—unless it is a breach of some duty imposed by law, not merely one imposed by contract. They point out that the right of action given by the statute is a new and distinct right of action, not a survival of the right of action which the injured person had before his death to recover damages. This is correct under our decisions. Anderson v. Fielding, 92 Minn. 42, 104 Am. St. Rep. 665, 99 N. W. 357, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 92; State ex rel. Carlson v. District Ct. 113 Minn. 96, 154 N. W. 661, 11 N. C. C. A. 630. See note to Rowe v. Richards, L.R.A.1915E, 1095, in which the author expresses the opinion that "the better rule will be found to be that based upon the theory that the cause of action is the injury to the person of the deceased, for which coexistent remedies or an exclusive remedy is given."

This means that the cause of action under the death statute remains the same cause of action that the injured person had before his death, the statute merely giving a new remedy. Such a rule would be a help in determining whether, when the cause of action survives, two actions may be maintained, one that of the estate of the deceased, the other that of the widow and next of kin. It might also be useful in a case such as Rowe v. Richards, 32 S. D. 66, L.R.A.1915E, 1069, 142 N. W. 664, where the South Dakota court held that a release by the injured person did not bar an action after his death brought under the statute for the benefit of the widow and children. See also notes to Lhota v. Oppenheimer, L.R.A.1915E, 1104; Edwards v. Interstate Chemical Corp. L.R.A.1916D, 121. But it is unnecessary to pursue this subject. Its chief importance here is with reference to the point that Keiper's cause of action, being based on breach of contract, survived his death. That is used as an argument in favor of the contention that the present action cannot be maintained. But whether the premise is sound or not, we find little weight in the argument. The books are full of cases where a right of action exists both under survival statutes and under statutes patterned after Lord Campbell's Act. Neither Keiper in his lifetime nor his personal representatives brought an action to recover damages for personal injuries. Whether such an action may still be maintained we need not consider.

Returning to the argument which is the real basis of counsel's contention that the action will not lie, that is, that the wrongful act or omission, or negligence, must be a breach of a duty imposed by law, not merely one imposed by contract. While, as we have held, the action is for breach of contract, the complaint abounds in charges of negligent and wrongful acts and omissions of the defendants. It alleges that Keiper's death was caused by these acts and omissions. Unless we can say that this cannot be, because there was no breach of a legal duty, it is apparent enough that the action will lie. The language of the statute is that where "death is caused by the wrongful act or omission of any person," the action may be maintained. Counsel cites some authorities to support this position. In Clark v. Gates, 84 Minn. 381, 87 N. W. 941, Justice Lovely used this expression: "To constitute a tort the act or omission must be entirely independent of contract rights." Citing 1 Hilliard, Torts, § 1. That was said in connection with the question for decision in that case, whether the evidence showed fraud or merely a breach of contract. It is doubtless true that the word "tort," as well as the word "wrongful," usually signifies a breach of legal duty, independent of contract rights. But this is by no means always true. Take such contract relations as carrier and passenger, physician and patient, attorney and client, landlord and tenant; when there is actual negligence or wrong on the part of the carrier, physician, attorney, or landlord, is it not still negligence or a wrong notwithstanding that the duty is imposed by the contract? There may be a breach of a contract without negligence, but there may be negligence or wrongful acts or omissions in the performance of a contract. It seems to us to make no difference whether the duty to use due care is one imposed directly by law, or exists because of the contract relation of the parties. We are unable to see why the complaint in this case does not allege negligence on the part of defendants, and that Keiper's death was caused by their wrongful acts and omissions.

We do not find support for the proposition of defendants' counsel that because the duty breached by defendants was one imposed by contract, this action will not lie. It is difficult for us to distinguish the multitude of cases where recovery has been allowed for the death of passengers, though no liability could exist except for the contract. And there have been cases where the liability of physician or surgeon for the death of a patient caused by his negligence has been upheld. 30 Cyc. 1578; Murdock v. Walker, 43 Ill. App. 590; Gores v. Graff, 77 Wis. 174, 46 N. W. 48. Staloch v. Holm, 100 Minn. 276, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 712, 111 N. W. 264, was a death case, and it apparently did not occur to the court that there was any doubt the action would lie. The same may be said of Martin v. Courtney, 75 Minn. 255, 77 N. W. 813, id. 87 Minn. 197, 91 N. W. 487. These cases are significant in view of the settled rule in this state that such an action is for breach of contract. We have found no malpractice case where a recovery for death has been denied on the ground that the statutory action could not be maintained.

As to the relation of landlord and tenant, we have been able to find no cases where a recovery was sought for death caused by a failure to keep a promise to repair or to furnish heat. The cases previously cited, Barron v. Liedloff, Good v. Von Hemert, and Glidden v. Goodfellow, indicate pretty clearly the position of this court that there may be such a thing as negligence in the performance of a contract duty.

Our conclusion is that we should not say, taking allegations of the complaint as true, that the death of plaintiff's intestate was not caused by the wrongful acts or omissions of the defendants. What the evidence will show we have no means of knowing. It may show no negligence, or contributory negligence. We simply hold that the complaint states a cause of action.

Order affirmed.

Brown, Ch. J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the decision in this case and therefore respectfully dissent. The sole question presented, stated in a word, is whether the next of kin of a deceased person may maintain an action in tort under the death by wrongful act statute, for an act alleged to have caused his death, which as to decedent amounted to nothing more than a breach of contract. In my opinion the question should be answered in the negative.

It seems well settled by the authorities that, where the act constituting a breach of contract is one of misfeasance, because prohibited by statute, or because a violation of some duty or obligation imposed by law as incident to particular contract relations, and in addition to those expressly stipulated by the parties, the injured party has the election to sue in tort or for a breach of the contract, as he deems best suited to appropriate and adequate relief. But where the act is one of nonfeasance, mere negligence unaccompanied by affirmative unlawful acts, the exclusive remedy is for a breach of the contract. Tuttle v. George H. Gilbert Mfg. Co. 145 Mass. 169, 13 N. E. 465; Lane v. Raynes, 223 Mass. 515, 112 N. E. 152; Flint & W. Mfg. Co. v. Beckett, 167 Ind. 491, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 924, 79 N. E. 503; Dustin v. Curtis, 74 N. H. 266, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 504, 67 Atl. 220, 13 Ann. Cas. 169; Mulvey v. Staab, 4 N. M. 173, 12 Pac. 699; Samuel v. Novak, 99 Md. 558, 58 Atl. 19; Nevin v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 106 Ill. 222, 46 Am. Rep. 688. The doctrine is stated with citation of authorities in the note to Flint & W. Mfg. Co. v. Beckett, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 924. Bishop, Non-Contract Law, § 76. It was applied by this court in Sargent v. Mason, 101 Minn. 319, 112 N. W. 255, an action like that at bar, for the failure of the landlord to heat the rented premises. In this case the complaint brings the action within the nonfeasance rule, there being no allegation therein showing anything more than a negligent failure to perform the contract. The obligation violated was imposed by express contract stipulation, not by the law, and decedent, had he survived, could have recovered only for the breach of the contract. And in this respect it is unimportant in what language the breach of the contract is charged, since the complaint as a whole discloses a simple failure to perform and nothing more. And since the sole remedy of decedent would have been for a breach of the contract, his personal representatives or next of kin have no greater right under the wrongful death statute, for the intent of that law was to extend to them the same right that was vested in decedent at his death. McLean v. Burbank, 12 Minn. 530, Gil. 438, wherein Mr. Justice Berry said in the course of the opinion therein: "The natural construction of this language would appear to be that the representatives may maintain their action for the same kind of act or omission, causing death, for which the intestate might have maintained an action had the resulting injury fallen short of death."

While a new action is given by the statute,—one that did not exist prior to its enactment,—it is founded wholly upon a right possessed by decedent, namely, a right of action in tort, and not in contract. That right, and only that right, passes by the statute to the next of kin. An attempt to proceed under the wrongful death statute for the failure of the landlord to perform the conditions of the lease was unsuccessful in Davis v. Smith, 26 R. I. 129, 66 L.R.A. 478, 106 Am. St. Rep. 691, 58 Atl. 630, 3 Ann. Cas. 832.

The demurrer to the complaint should be sustained.

Holt, J.: I concur in the views of the Chief Justice.

Petition for rehearing denied.

Taylor, C., filed the following opinion:

Chapter 463 of the Laws of the State of Minnesota approved April 20, 1917, provides:

"It shall be unlawful from and after the passage of this act for any person to print, publish or circulate in any manner whatsoever any book, pamphlet, or written or printed matter that advocates or attempts to advocate that men should not enlist in the military or naval forces of the United States or the state of Minnesota." § 1.

"It shall be unlawful for any person to teach or advocate by any written or printed matter whatsoever, or by oral speech, that the citizens of this state should not aid or assist the United States in prosecuting or carrying on war with the public enemies of the United States." § 3.

The defendants were indicted upon the charge that they had violated this statute by circulating a pamphlet which is set forth in full in the indictment. They demurred to the indictment. The trial court overruled the demurrer, and then, at their request, certified four questions to this court which may be summarized as follows:

(1) Whether the facts stated in the indictment constitute a public offense.

(2) Whether the statute conflicts with § 8 of article 1 of the Federal Constitution.

(3) Whether the statute conflicts with § 1 of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

(4) Whether the Act of Congress of June 15, 1917,—the so-called Espionage Law,—supersedes, suspends, or annuls the state statute.

The pamphlet is, in the main, an attack upon the Act of Congress of May 18, 1917, commonly known as the Selective Draft Law; but it does not stop with an attack upon that law. It asserts, among other things, that "this war was arbitrarily declared against the will of the people;" that the people are ten to one against it; that "the President and Congress have forced this war upon the United States;" that now "they are attempting by military conscription to force us to fight a war to which we are opposed;" that "the integrity of the country is being menaced;" that "this war was declared to protect the investments of Wall street in the bonds of the Allies."

It then asks: "Why should the entire population be called upon to suffer and die because a few individuals have invested their surplus wealth unwisely? Are you ready to give your life to save their dollars?"

Defendants contend that the term "enlist" as used in the state statute refers only to voluntary enlistments, and that the statute is not violated by an attempt to deter men from complying with the Conscription Law; while the state contends that the term "enlist" as used in the statute is broad enough to include enlistments under the Conscription Law as well as voluntary enlistments, and that the statute is violated by an attempt to deter men from complying with the Conscription Law as well as by an attempt to deter them from enlisting voluntarily. It is not necessary to determine this question in this case for the pamphlet does not confine itself to opposing the means adopted for raising troops, but impugns the motives which induced the President and Congress to enter into the war, and attempts by unfounded and unwarranted assertions to incite opposition to the war and to create a feeling that we have been brought into it for mercenary and unworthy purposes. It manifests not merely opposition to conscription, but opposition to the war and to carrying on the war in any manner. Without saying in so many words "that men should not enlist," the whole tenor of the article is calculated to incite opposition to the war and to deter men from enlisting or otherwise aiding in carrying it on. To violate the statute it is not necessary that the pamphlet circulated should directly and expressly urge men to refrain from enlisting, but the statute is violated if the natural and reasonable effect of the pamphlet circulated is to deter men from doing so. Masses Pub. Co. v. Patten (C. C. A.) 245 Fed. 102; United States v. Pierce (D. C.) 245 Fed. 878. We think that such is the effect of the pamphlet in question, and the contention of defendants that, although the pamphlet opposes compliance with the Conscription Law, it does not oppose voluntary enlistment, and for that reason does not transgress the statute, cannot be sustained.

Defendants also contend in effect that as § 8 of article 1 of the Federal Constitution confers upon Congress the power to declare war and raise armies and to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into effect the powers so conferred, it is beyond the power of the state to prohibit its citizens from hindering or interfering with the raising of such armies; that laws to accomplish that purpose can be enacted only by Congress.

These constitutional provisions and the laws of Congress passed pursuant thereto were under consideration in Presser v. Illinois, 116 U. S. 252, 29 L. ed. 615, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 580, and in Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. 1, 5 L. ed. 19. In the Presser Case it was held that a law of the state of Illinois prohibiting any body of men, other than the militia of the state and the troops of the United States, from drilling or parading with arms without a license from the governor, did not infringe either the Federal Constitution or the Federal laws, as it did not interfere with the organization, arming, and drilling of the militia as provided by the Federal laws. In the Houston Case a statute of the state of Pennsylvania providing that a member of the militia of that state who was called into the service of the United States and who refused to obey such call should be tried by a state court-martial and be liable to the penalties prescribed by the act of Congress was held valid as the delinquent had not actually entered the Federal service, and the Federal jurisdiction L.R.A.1918C.

had not become exclusive. It is clear from these and numerous other Federal decisions that state statutes do not offend against the constitutional provisions cited unless they trench upon the power of the national government to raise troops, or interfere with or hinder the operation of the Federal laws governing such matters. The statute here in question does neither; it merely prohibits advocating, within this state, that men should not enlist and should not aid in prosecuting the war against the public enemies. In enacting it as a police regulation, the legislature was well within its province.

Neither do we think that the so-called Espionage Law of June 15, 1917, passed by Congress, abrogates or supersedes this statute. The citizens of the state are also citizens of the United States and owe a duty both to the state and to the United States. The state is a part of the nation and owes a duty to the nation to support, in full measure, the efforts of the national government to secure the safety and protect the rights of its citizens and to preserve, maintain, and enforce the sovereign rights of the nation against the public enemies, and to that end the state may require its citizens to refrain from any act which will interfere with or impede the national government in effectively prosecuting the war against such public enemies. It is the duty of all citizens of the state to aid the state in performing its duties as a part of the nation, and the fact that such citizens are also citizens of the United States and owe a direct duty to the nation does not absolve them from their duty to the state, nor preclude the state from enforcing such duty. Halter v. Nebraska, 205 U. S. 34, 51 L. ed. 696, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 419, 10 Ann. Cas. 525. True, the state cannot make or enforce requirements which are inconsistent with those of the national government, for those of the national government are paramount in case of conflict. But here there is no conflict between the state statute and the Federal law, and both may subsist and be given effect. Presser v. Illinois, supra.

"Every citizen of the United States is also a citizen of a state or territory. He may be said to owe allegiance to two sovereigns, and may be liable . . . for an infraction of the laws of either. The same act may be an offense or transgression of the laws of both." Moore v. Illinois, 14 How. 13, 14 L. ed. 306.

"Where a person owes a duty to two sovereigns, he is amenable to both for its performance, and either may call him to account." Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 25 L. ed. 717.

Colorado*, 187 U. S. 137, 47 L. ed. 108, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 92, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 506; State v. Oleson, 26 Minn. 507, 5 N. W. 959; State v. Lee, 29 Minn. 445, 13 N. W. 913.

The state statute prohibits citizens of the state from discouraging enlistment in either the state or national military forces and from advocating that citizens of the state should not aid in carrying on the war. The act of Congress provides: "Whoever, when the United States is at war, shall wilfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States or to promote the success of its enemies and whoever, when the United States is at war, shall wilfully cause or attempt to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty, in the military or naval forces of the United States, or shall wilfully obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States, to the injury of the service or of the United States, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than twenty years, or both."

Defendants recognize and call attention to the wide difference between these laws. The one is designed to enforce a duty which the citizen of the state owes to the state; the other to enforce a duty which the citizen of the United States owes to the United States. There are many acts which may violate one, but not the other, of these laws, and there are also many acts which may violate both, but the state statute is not necessarily invalid for that reason. There is nothing in the statute which is inconsistent with the Federal law, nor which in any manner interferes with, hinders, or delays the operation of that law. The state has control of its internal affairs, and in the exercise of its police power may prescribe rules of conduct for its citizens, and may forbid whatever is inimical to the public interests, or contrary to the public policy of the state. 6 R. C. L. p. 191, § 190. That the state is inhibited from exerting its police power to obstruct the operations of the national government, or to regulate matters controlled and regulated by the national government, does not mean that in time of war it may not make the national purposes its own purposes to the extent of exerting its police power to prevent its own citizens from obstructing the accomplishment of such purposes.

Defendants also contend that the statute abridges the freedom of speech and of the press secured to citizens of the United States by the 1st section of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. To what extent this Amendment takes from the states the power to place legislative restrictions upon the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press is still a mooted question; but, conceding that it protects this right from abridgment by the states, the freedom secured thereby is not an unlimited license to speak and to publish whatever one may choose. It is settled that the state may prohibit publications or teachings which are injurious to society, or which tend to subvert or imperil the government or to impede or hinder it in the performance of its public and governmental duties without infringing the constitutional provisions which preserve freedom of speech and of the press. These constitutional provisions preserve the right to speak and to publish without previously submitting for official approval the matter to be spoken or published, but do not grant immunity to those who abuse this privilege, nor prevent the state from making it a penal offense to publish or advocate matters or measures inimical to the public welfare. State v. Pioneer Press Co. 100 Minn. 173, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 480, 117 Am. St. Rep. 684, 110 N. W. 867, 10 Ann. Cas. 351; Patterson v. Colorado, 205 U. S. 454, 51 L. ed. 879, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 556, 10 Ann. Cas. 689; United States v. Pierce (D. C.) 245 Fed. 878; People v. Most, 171 N. Y. 423, 58 L.R.A. 509, 64 N. E. 175; Respublica v. Dennie, 4 Yeates, 267, 2 Am. Dec. 402; 2 Story, Const. § 1880.

The United States is at war, and we think the legislature did not exceed its power in making it a criminal offense to advocate that men should not enlist in the military forces or aid in prosecuting the war.

The first question is answered in the affirmative and each of the others in the negative; and the case will be remanded for further proceedings in the trial court.

Annotation—Power of state under Federal Constitution to legislate with respect to Army and Navy.

This note purports to include in general only cases involving the validity of state laws relating to the Army and L.R.A.1918C.

Navy as affected by the power of Congress or of the Federal government over the same. In other words, the question considered is one of conflict of authority; and cases involving the validity of state legislation as affected by other considerations are not covered. Nor does the note include cases treating merely the question of the powers of the state courts.

The Federal Constitution, in art. 1, § 8, provides that the Congress shall have power "to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer time than two years; to provide and maintain a navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions; to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of United States, reserving to the states, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." It also provides in art. 1, § 10, that no state shall, without the consent of Congress, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace.

STATE v. HOLM, ante, 304, in upholding the constitutionality of a state law prohibiting the publication or circulation of any book, pamphlet, etc., advocating that men should not enlist in the military or naval forces of the state or of the United States, seems to be clearly in accord with the interpretation placed by earlier decisions on the Federal Constitution and laws of Congress enacted pursuant thereto, although no case of a precisely similar nature has been found. The statute in the HOLM CASE was held not an interference with the power of Congress over the Army and Navy, nor inconsistent with any act of Congress with respect thereto.

Most of the cases on the question of the power of the states under the Federal Constitution to legislate with respect to the Army and Navy have been concerned with legislation relating to the militia; and many of these decisions are now of historical interest only, because of subsequent changes in the laws enacted by Congress. The respective powers of Congress and of the states will be made clearer, however, by a reference to some of these cases; but it should be observed that there are other cases also on the same ultimate question which do not involve the validity of state laws, and therefore are not included in the note.

to Congress in the reservation to the states of the appointment of officers and the training of the militia was not intended as an expression of the only power which was left to the states over the militia. Ansley v. Timmons (1825) 3 M'Cord, L. (S. C.) 329; Dunne v. People (1879) 94 Ill. 120, 34 Am. Rep. 213.

Thus, it is said in People ex rel. Leo v. Hill (1891) 126 N. Y. 497, 27 N. E. 789, and the statement is supported by other cases cited in the note, that the power conferred upon Congress by the Federal Constitution to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia "does not exclude state legislation upon the same subject, unless the power conferred on Congress is actually exercised. The power to control and organize the militia resided in the several states at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and was not taken away by that instrument. The power of legislation over the subject after its adoption was concurrent in the states and in Congress, and the power of state legislation remained until Congress, in the exercise of the power conferred upon it by the Constitution, had legislated. State legislation in relation to the militia is only excluded when repugnant to or inconsistent with Federal legislation, enacted within the purview of the power conferred by the Federal Constitution; and there is authority for regarding state legislation as inconsistent, which undertakes to supplement laws passed by Congress, covering the subject of the power, by annexing new qualifications or incidents not prescribed by the Federal law."

And it was held in People ex rel. Leo v. Hill (N. Y.) supra, that a state law conferring on the governor, as commander in chief, the power to disband national guard organizations, did not violate the Federal Constitution. The court stated that, assuming that authority to disband a company must be found in the Federal statutes, this power was implied in that conferred by the act of Congress declaring that the militia of each state shall be arranged into divisions, brigades, etc., "as the legislature of the state may direct." To the effect, however, that a governor of a state has no power to depose an officer in or disturb the organization of militia or volunteer regiments after they are mustered into the service of the United States, see (1862) 10 Ops. Atty. Gen. 279, and (1898) 22 Ops. Atty. Gen. 225. See, in this connection, note to Lewis v. Lewelling, 23 L.R.A. 510, on the power of the governor to disband militia.

The Illinois Statute of 1879, providing for the organizing, arming, drilling, and maintaining of the state militia, was held in Dunne v. People (Ill.) supra, not invalid as in conflict with the Federal Constitution or the laws of Congress. And the fact that the state law might not be in harmony with the acts of Congress in minor matters as to detail of organization was held not to render the state law invalid, especially where the repugnancies were in those sections of the law relating to the organization of the active militia when organized for state purposes, and not in those sections relating to the entire body of the militia, nor to the militia when called into the service of the United States.

And the above statute was held also, in Dunne v. People (Ill.) supra, not in violation of the provision of the Federal Constitution prohibiting states from keeping "troops" in time of peace.

Under the provision of the Federal Constitution that no state shall, without the consent of Congress, keep troops in time of peace, the court was of the opinion in Smith v. Wanser (1902) 68 N. J. L. 249, 52 Atl. 309, that a state is prohibited from organizing or maintaining any state force other than militia, in time of peace, unless the consent of Congress has first been obtained. And although holding that the state legislature by the Act of 1900 did not intend to create an organized body of troops known as the National Guard, distinct from and not included within the militia, the court stated in effect that if the act in question was so intended, it violated this provision of the Federal Constitution.

It was held in State ex rel. Madigan v. Wagner (1898) 74 Minn. 518, 42 L.R.A. 749, 73 Am. St. Rep. 369, 77 N. W. 424, that the national guard or active militia of the state, organized under state law, the members of which, when not engaged, at stated periods, in drilling and training for military duty, were employed in their usual civil avocations, subject to call for military service when public exigencies should require, were neither "troops," within the meaning of the above provision of the Federal Constitution, nor a "standing army," within the meaning of § 14 of the Bill of Rights of the state Constitution.

Under the Act of Congress of 1792, providing that persons of the age of eighteen years and under the age of forty-five years, except as thereafter provided, should be enrolled in the militia, and exempting from military duty certain officers and "all persons who now are or may hereafter be exempted by the laws of the respective states," it was competent for the legislature to exempt from enrolment in the militia persons of certain ages, as those under twenty-one and over thirty years of age. Opinion of Justices (1839) 22 Pick. (Mass.) 571.

In Opinion of Justices (1860) 14 Gray (Mass.) 614, it was held that, as the Federal government had authority to determine who should compose the militia, and had so determined by the Act of Congress of 1792, a state legislature could not constitutionally provide for the enrolment in the militia of any persons other than those enumerated in such act.

However, a state law declaring aliens between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, who had resided in the state for six months, to be subject to militia duty, was held in Ansley v. Timmons (1825) 3 M'Cord, L. (S. C.) 329, not invalid as offending against the Federal Constitution or statutes or the Law of Nations. The note does not cover the general question whether an alien is subject to military duty.

The cases of Presser v. Illinois (1886) 116 U. S. 252, 29 L. ed. 615, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 580, and Houston v. Moore (1820) 5 Wheat. (U. S.) 1, 5 L. ed. 19, sustaining respectively the validity of statutes of Illinois and of Pennsylvania, are set out in STATE v. HOLM, ante, 304.

Presser v. Illinois (U. S.) supra, was followed in Com. v. Murphy (1896) 166 Mass. 172, 32 L.R.A. 608, 44 N. E. 138, holding that the constitutional right to bear and keep arms for the common defense was not violated by a statute prohibiting unauthorized bodies of men to associate together as a military organization, or to drill and parade with arms in cities and towns; and that the fact that the statute exempted certain independent military bodies from its operation did not render it unconstitutional as class legislation. In this connection, see annotation on "Constitutional right to bear arms," appended to State v. Keet, L.R.A. 1917C, 63, and earlier notes therein referred to.

In Re Fair (1900) 100 Fed. 149, in holding that the state courts were without jurisdiction to try one accused of murder where it appeared that the act was done in the performance of his duty as a soldier of the United States, the court said: "In the matter before us the petitioners were acting for and on behalf of the United States, under the military authority of the United States,—a subject-matter the control of which, under the Constitution, is vested solely in the general government. The state cannot in any particular, either through its legislature or judicial department, regulate or circumscribe the powers of the United States in respect thereto. The wisdom, expediency, or justness of the military laws, rules, and regulations adopted and prescribed by the United States are no concern of the state. The proper enforcement of such laws, rules, and regulations cannot be measured and determined by state laws."

Although the note does not purport to cover questions as to the validity of statutes respecting the Army and Navy arising merely under the state Constitution or laws, attention is called to the recent case of State ex rel. Morris v. Handlin (1917) 38 S. D. 550, 162 N. W. 379, holding that the state Constitution was not violated by a statute enacted by the legislature of South Dakota in 1917, providing that every enlisted man in the Fourth South Dakota Infantry (which had been drafted into the Federal service and had served on the Mexican border) should be paid at the time of his return from the Federal service the sum of $75, and making an appropriation therefor. The statute declared that the payment was made for the "purpose of encouraging military training, the payment for services of the members of said regiment for Federal services upon the Mexican border, and for continued service in the National Guard Reserve of the United States." And the provisions of the state Constitution which it was contended were violated were that "no indebtedness shall be incurred or money expended by the state, and no warrant shall be drawn upon the state treasurer except in pursuance of an appropriation for the specific purpose first made;" that the legislature should not grant any extra compensation to any public officer, employee, or agent after the service shall have been rendered or the contracts made, nor authorize the payment of any claims created against the state under any agreement or contract made without express authority of law, except that the legislature might make appropriations for expenditures incurred in suppressing insurrection or repelling invasion; and that the legislature should not make donations to individuals, associations, or corporations.

The question whether state militias are subject to the Articles of War of the United States is treated in a note to State ex rel. Poole v. Peake, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 354. R. E. H.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Forrest County in its favor, for a part only of its claim, in an action brought to recover a balance alleged to be due on the premium on an employers' liability policy issued by plaintiff to defendant. Reversed.

Statement by Smith, Ch. J.:

This action was begun in the court below by appellant, to recover of appellee a balance alleged to be due it on the premium on an employers' liability policy issued by it to appellee on March 31, 1909. Several pleas were filed by appellee, in one of which is alleged the breach of a collateral agreement alleged to have been entered into by appellant with appellee when a similar policy was issued by it to appellee in 1908, by reason of which appellant is indebted to appellee in an amount in excess of that sued for; by another plea, however, an indebtedness of something over $200 was admitted, and the tender thereof to appellant made. At the close of the evidence, and at the request of appellee, the jury were peremptorily instructed to find for appellant for the amount admitted to be due by appellee, and there was a verdict and judgment accordingly.

Louis V. Clark & Co. are insurance agents, doing business at Birmingham, Alabama, and represent a number of fire, accident, and industrial insurance companies, among which are appellant and the Industrial Insurance Company of Birmingham, Alabama, neither of which have any connection with the other. Clark & Co. are the managers of appellant's Southern Department, composed of the states of Alabama and Mississippi. The Industrial Insurance Company was organized by Louis V. Clark himself, who is also the president and principal stockholder thereof. For a number of years prior to the institution of this suit appellee had been obtaining annually through Clark & Co. two insurance policies, one an employers' liability, and the other a workmen's collective, policy; the former indemnifying it for all money paid to employees as damages for injuries suffered by them on account of appellee's negligence, and the latter indemnifying it for money paid to employees for certain losses sustained by them for which appellee was not legally responsible. Separate written applications were annually made by appellee for each of these policies, both of which would be at times written by appellant, and were so written by it in March, 1906, the policies expiring in March, 1907. The premiums on the policies were based on a per cent of the total amount of wages paid by appellee to its employees during the period of time covered by the policies. When the two policies issued by appellant in 1906 were about to expire, appellee declined to renew them unless the premiums thereon were reduced, whereupon Louis V. Clark went in person to appellee's place of business, and in an interview with L. L. Major, its manager, it was agreed that the employers' liability policy should be written by appellant at the premium rate of 80 cents on each $100 of wages paid by appellee, and that the workmen's collective policy should be written by the Industrial Insurance Company at the rate of $1.70 for each $100 of wages paid by appellee, making a total rate on the two policies of 2½ per cent on the amount of wages paid; Clark promising and for his agency personally guaranteeing that the net amount to be paid the Industrial Insurance Company in premiums would be reduced to such an extent that the total amount paid both companies would not exceed 2 per cent of the amount of wages paid its employees by appellee. This reduction was to be brought about in the manner set forth in the letters hereinafter set out. Upon Clark's return to Birmingham he mailed the policies to appellee, the letter inclosing the policy of the Industrial Company being as follows:

London Guarantee & Accident Company, Limited, of London, England. United States Branch: Head Office, Chicago, Ill. A. W. Masters, General Manager. Southern Department: Louis V. Clark & Co., Managers, 214-216 North 20th Street, P. O. Drawer 891, Birmingham, Ala. Long Distance Telephone 607.

Dear Sirs:—

No. 10782—Industrial Insurance Co. Inclosed herewith is the above-numbered policy issued in lieu of No. 10728, which you will kindly return to us for cancelation. In connection with the policy inclosed, and B-7723—London Guarantee & Accident Company, covering employers' liability, we wish to say to you that this office personally guarantees that the rate your company will have to pay shall not exceed 2 per cent total, and shall be as much less as you can help us to make it by reducing the losses to a minimum and keeping down the hospital and medical charges, which no other company allows, so far as we are aware, in what is known as their workmen's collective policy. At the end of the year, we will give you an itemized statement showing all expenditures, including indemnity, hospital and medical charges, and such other items not contemplated by the policy which we may allow, and incidental home office expenses of conducting the business, and this sum total will be subtracted from the sum total of premium, and the difference divided equally between your office and our own, which gives you the benefit of our seventeen years' continuous connection as agents and adjusters of losses at the least possible cost. We make this concession confidentially, because it is not, generally speaking, a strictly business underwriting proposition, yet we have had your plant continuously since 1890, and feel that we can make a concession that would be valuable to your interests, especially so since Messrs. Major and Sowers are of so great value in assisting us in the settlement of claims, which keeps our loss ratio down to a minimum, and in consequence think your company should enjoy the benefits. We would not like this to be known among the other milling interests, which pay us largely in excess of your charges, for the reason that we could not afford to make so low a rate where the service rendered by the assured is not of the same degree of intelligence and activity in handling claims promptly. Kindly sign the inclosed application and return, together with policy No. 10726, greatly obliging

Yours very truly,

Louis V. Clark & Co.,

RS Enc.

Mgrs. So. Dept.

Upon the expiration of these policies they were each renewed upon written applications therefor, the renewals being mailed by Clark & Co. to Major under the same cover, the letter accompanying them being practically a duplicate of the one hereinbefore set out, by which the industrial policy of the preceding year had been forwarded, and is as follows:

London Guarantee & Accident Company, Limited, of London, England. United States Branch: Head Office, Chicago, Ill. A. W. Masters, General Manager. Southern Department: Louis V. Clark & Co., Managers, 214-216 North 20th Street, P. O. Drawer 891, Birmingham, Ala. Long Distance Telephone 607.

Hattiesburg, Miss.

Dear Sir:—

10925—Industrial—B—11350—L. G. & A. Inclosed herewith are the above-numbered policies, issued in accordance with applications a few days since. In this connection we wish to confirm the verbal agreement that our office personally guarantees that the rate your company will have to pay shall not exceed 2 per cent total, and shall be as much less as you can help us to make it, by reducing the losses to a minimum and keeping down the hospital and medical charges, and such other charges which we have been paying in the past, not contemplated nor included in the policies, which no other company allows, so far as we are aware, in what is known as the workmen's collective policy. At the end of the year we will give you an itemized statement showing all expenditures, including indemnity, hospital and medical charges, and other items not contemplated by the policy, which you may allow, and incidental home office expenses in conducting the business. This sum will be subtracted from the sum total of the premium on the workmen's collective policy, and the difference divided between your office and our own. This gives you the benefit of our eighteen years' continuous management and adjustment of your losses, which with your assistance we have been able to keep at a minimum. This concession is made to your company personally on your account, in a confidential way, because it is not, generally speaking, a strictly business underwriting proposition, yet we are glad personally to make this special concession to your company, for the reason that at the rates written we have to regard it more as a sentimental than business proposition. And again, we feel that our losses will be kept down by the excellent management of yourself, assisted by Mr. Sowers, to that point which guarantees safety on the proposition as a whole. . . . Kindly acknowledge receipt, and oblige,

Yours truly,

Louis V. Clark & Co.,

The premiums due each of these companies on the policies issued by them in 1907 and 1908 were paid according to the stipulations therein and without any complaint on the part of appellee. Prior to the expiration of the policies issued in April, 1908, Major severed his connection with appellee, and when the policies expired in 1909 his successor declined to renew the same on the old basis, and the negotiations between him and Clark & Co. relative thereto resulted in appellant issuing to appellee an employers' liability policy on which the premium to be paid was 55 cents on each $100 of wages paid by it to its employees, and the Industrial Company issuing to it a workmen's collective policy, on which the premium to be paid was $1.25 on each $100 of wages paid by it to its employees. When appellant's policy was issued, the amount of wages that would probably be paid its employees by appellee during the period covered by it was estimated, and a premium based thereon paid, but at the end of the period it developed that appellee had paid its employees an amount of wages largely in excess of that estimated, resulting in a balance being due by it to appellant of something over $1,000. This it declined to pay, claiming that appellant had guaranteed, when the policies were renewed in 1908, that the combined rate to be paid it and the Industrial Company by appellee would not exceed 2 per cent of the amount of wages paid by appellee to its workmen, but that each company had collected the full rate provided by the policies, so that appellee had paid a total rate of 2½ per cent on the amount of wages paid its employees, from which it follows that appellant is indebted to it in the amount thus overpaid the two companies, which amount exceeds that due by appellee to appellant on the policy written in 1909. Appellant knew nothing of the arrangement made by Clark & Co. with appellee relative to premiums to be paid on any of these policies to the Industrial Insurance Company.

Messrs. Stevens & Cook for appellant.

Mr. S. E. Travis, for appellee:

The written guaranty made contemporaneously with the policy in consideration thereof is a part of the written contract.

Smith, Ch. J, delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee's claim is based altogether upon the second letter written by Clark & Co. to Major, inclosing the two policies issued in April, 1908, and it objected in the court below to the introduction by appellant of the letter written by Clark & Co. in 1907, inclosing the policy of the Industrial Insurance Company then issued, and also to the testimony hereinbefore set out, of the matters which rest in parol. It will be unnecessary for us to pass upon the rulings of the court below on the objections interposed to this evidence, for the reason that the guaranty contained in the letter relied on by appellee from Louis V. Clark & Co. to Major, appellee's manager, that the total premium to be paid by appellant on the two policies inclosed therein "shall not exceed 2 per cent" (on the total amount of wages paid by appellee to its employees), purports, and consequently must be held, to be the personal guaranty of the agents, and not of their principal, for the body of the letter, and not the form of the signature thereto, must control. *Revolving Scraper Co. v. BOARD OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS County — cost of feeding prisoners.

Moneys lawfully expended by a sheriff in the feeding of prisoners, and fees earned by him in the discharge of duties imposed upon him by the Constitution and laws of the state, constitute a valid charge against the county, and are not within the limitations imposed upon the county by § 26, art. 10, Constitution.

ERROR to the District Court for Craig County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover judgment on claims against the county for a certain amount for the board of prisoners, payment of which had been refused by defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Willard H. Voyles for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. H. Kornegay for defendant in error.

Hardy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

L. P. Smartt, sheriff of Craig county, commenced this action against the board of county commissioners of Craig county to recover judgment on claims against said county to the amount of $282.34, for the board of prisoners, etc., payment of which had been refused on the ground that the revenue provided for such purposes for the fiscal year, during which said claims arose, had been exhausted prior to the accrual or presentation thereof. Judgment was for the county, and plaintiff appeals. The case was submitted to the trial court on an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears that the claims were chargeable to and payable out of the contingent fund for the fiscal year 1912-1913; that the estimate of the contingent fund for said year was $5,000, the assessed value of said property for said county was $15,178,000, and that a levy of .36 mills was regularly made to produce $5,000, and 10 per cent additional for delinquent taxes, and that on and prior to May 5, 1913, legal claims had been filed against said funds, and had been regularly audited and allowed, in the sum of $4,998.53, for which warrants had been issued on and prior to May 5, 1913, and that the services covered by said claims were rendered and performed prior to the services represented by the claims of plaintiff; that three fifths of the voters of said county, voting at an election held for that purpose, had not, during said fiscal year and prior to February 20, 1915, assented to the county becoming indebted for any purpose to an amount exceeding in said fiscal year the income and revenue of said fund for said year.

It is contended that the claims presented by plaintiff constitute no valid charge against the county, and therefore the judgment in his favor was erroneous. This contention was based upon the application of § 26, art. 10 (§ 291, Wms. Anno.), Const., which provides: "No county . . . shall be allowed to become indebted, in any manner, or for any purpose, to an amount exceeding, in any year, the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of three fifths of the voters thereof, voting at an election, to be held for that purpose. . . ."

It is the clear intention of this provision that counties shall not be allowed to become indebted except in the manner provided, and if the claims of plaintiff come within its terms the judgment was erroneous. We do not think, however, that such claims are affected thereby. Section 18, art. 25 (§ 382, Wms. Anno.), Const., is as follows: "Until otherwise provided by law, the terms, duties, powers, qualifications, and salary and compensation of all county and township officers, not otherwise provided by this Constitution, shall be as now provided by the laws of the territory of Oklahoma for like named officers. . . ."

Section 2 of article 17 (§ 320a, Wms. Anno.), Const., creates, subject to change by the legislature, certain offices for each organized county, including the office of sheriff, and his duties, salary, and compensation L.R.A.1918C.

were fixed by § 18, art. 25, according to the duties, salaries, and compensation performed and enjoyed by sheriffs at the time the Constitution was adopted. Referring to § 2995, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. 1903, we find the rate of compensation allowed the sheriff for services of the character herein involved and the rate therein fixed continued until changed by § 3197, Rev. Laws 1910, which made some unimportant changes in the rate of compensation for such duties, and, by virtue of the change, the sheriff is entitled to receive compensation under the provisions of said law as changed, unless prevented by § 26, art. 10. It is clear from the nature of the claims presented that the services were rendered in the discharge of plaintiff's duty as sheriff, and some of those duties he could neglect only at grave peril to himself. The keeping of prisoners confided to his custody is enjoined upon him by law, and should he refuse to receive any person as a prisoner he would, by § 2245, Rev. Laws 1910, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and if, after receiving any such prisoner in his custody, he should wilfully or carelessly allow such prisoner to escape or go at large except as might be permitted by law, he would, under § 2244, be guilty of a felony and subject to prosecution therefor. So we have this situation: An officer compelled to perform at his peril certain duties which involve the expenditure of his private funds, and subject to imprisonment for a failure to do so, is penalized by being denied compensation therefor.

It may be contended with some show of reason that § 26, art. 10, taken alone, would bear the construction urged, but it is a fundamental rule of construction that to determine the meaning and scope of one provision it must be read in the light of and with due regard for other provisions. Re Application of State to Issue Bonds, 33 Okla. 797, 127 Pac. 1065.

The very purpose of creating a state government by the people is to delegate thereto the performance of certain functions looking to the common safety and welfare, and the necessity for the performance of these functions through the agency of the state and its various subdivisions is the sole object for its creation. The people have provided in the Constitution for a full set of state officers, and have created separate departments and co-ordinate branches of the government and various municipal subdivisions, and confided to each the performance of certain duties which are made mandatory because necessary for the protection and well-being of the people composing the state. There has been much controversy among publicists and thinkers, and much conflict in the decisions of the courts, as to the proper and necessary limitations upon the powers delegated to the different departments and arms of the state government; but it is conceded by all that certain necessary fundamental functions must always be actively exercised in order to preserve the existence of the state and secure to the people the rights guaranteed to them, among which are the right to life, liberty, the possession of property, and the pursuit of happiness, and, should the state become so impotent as to be unable to discharge these functions, there would result a failure of the purposes for which government was established. The surest way to bring about this result is to construe the Constitution in such a way as to place it in the power of one set of officials to deprive another of the means necessary for the performance of the duties imposed upon that other. If we give the Constitution such construction, the enforcement of laws for the regulation and protection of the public peace and safety in any county might, in its ultimate analysis, depend upon the whim and caprice of certain local officials, who might, by failing and refusing to make proper provision therefor, render it impossible to secure an enforcement of such laws by the officers charged with the duty of so doing. The items embraced in plaintiff's claim, being incurred in the necessary discharge of his duties imposed upon him by the imperative mandate of the law, are not within the limitation imposed by § 26, art. 10. A similar question was presented in Re Application of State to Issue Bonds, supra. That was an application by the state to determine the existence, character, and amount of the legal outstanding indebtedness of the state, and to issue funding bonds therefor. Warrants were issued from time to time during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, in payment of the ordinary, current expenses of maintaining the state government pursuant to valid legislation, for which provisions had been made by the levy of taxes which, in addition to the revenues expected to be derived from other sources, was believed to be sufficient to meet the ordinary current expenses for which the warrants were drawn. It is true in that case that the warrants were within the amount appropriated, while here the claims exceed the estimate made by the board of county commissioners, but the case is in point in principle because, by § 23, art. 10 (§ 288, Wms. Anno.), Const., the state was prohibited from contracting debts on account of deficits or failures in revenue to exceed at any one time $400,000, and it was contended that the warrants, which amounted to something in excess of $2,000,000, were void because issued in violation of said § 23, art. 10. The limitations imposed by that section were held not to apply to that class of pecuniary obligations arising out of the ordinary, necessary current expenses of maintaining the state government which were otherwise legal and valid.

Similar provisions have been construed in other states by the courts of last resort, holding that the ordinary expenses of maintaining a county and municipal government are not within the limitation of constitutional provisions such as § 26, art. 10.

Section 18 of article 11 of the California Constitution is as follows: "No county, city, town, township, board of education, or school district shall incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner, or for any purpose, exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for it for such year, without the assent of two thirds of the qualified" voters, etc.

The supreme court of that state in Lewis v. Widber, 99 Cal. 412, 33 Pac. 1128, held that this clause of the Constitution referred only to an indebtedness or liability which one of the municipalities mentioned had itself incurred, and did not include a liability for the salary of a municipal officer whose office had been created and salary fixed by the statute.

Section 6, art. 8, of the Constitution of Washington provides: "No county, city, town, school district, or other municipal corporation, shall for any purpose become indebted in any manner to an amount exceeding one and one half per centum of the taxable property in such county, . . . without the assent of three fifths of the voters therein voting at an election . . . for that purpose. . . ."

In Rauch v. Chapman, 16 Wash. 568, 36 L.R.A. 407, 58 Am. St. Rep. 52, 48 Pac. 253, the court reviewed the authorities upon this question and reached the conclusion that said provision did not apply to fees of witnesses in criminal cases and to fees of sheriffs for serving criminal process, or to the expenses of the general state election, since both of the former were necessary under the Bill of Rights of that state, and the latter was necessary under another provision of the Constitution providing for such elections. Duryee v. Friars, 18 Wash. 55, 50 Pac. 583; Hull v. Ames, 26 Wash. 272, 90 Am. St. Rep. 743, 66 Pac. 391; Gladwin v. Ames, 30 Wash. 608, 71 Pac. 189; Pilling v. Everett, 67 Wash. 109, 120 Pac. 873; Farquharson v. Yeargin, 24 Wash. 549, 64 Pac. 717.

Section 12 of article 10 of the Constitution of Missouri prohibited any political corporation or subdivision of the state from becoming indebted in any manner or for any purpose to an amount exceeding in any year the income and revenue for such year without the assent of two thirds of the voters thereof, voting at an election to be held for that purpose. The supreme court of that state, in Potter v. Douglas County, 87 Mo. 239, held that this provision had no application to a debt incurred by the county for the keeping and transportation of its prisoners by the sheriff or jailer to another county, under the provisions of the statute then in force.

In Grant County v. Lake County, 17 Or. 453, 21 Pac. 447, the supreme court of Oregon construed the constitutional inhibition of that state that no county should create any debts or liabilities which should singly or in the aggregate exceed the sum of $5,000, except to suppress insurrection or repel invasion, and held that such provision only applied to debts and liabilities which a county in its corporate character, and as an artificial person, voluntarily created, and did not include such debts and liabilities as were imposed upon them by law. Eaton v. Mimnaugh, 43 Or. 465, 73 Pac. 754.

Section 157 of the Constitution of Kentucky provides: "No county, city, town, taxing district, or other municipality shall be authorized or permitted to become indebted, in any manner or for any purpose, to an amount exceeding, in any year, the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two thirds of the voters thereof, voting at an election to be held for that purpose. . . ."

And this provision has been construed as not applying to claims other than those which the municipality might incur of its own volition. In other words, that it did not include expenses necessary for the maintenance of the municipal government. O'Bryan v. Owensboro, 113 Ky. 680, 68 S. W. 858, 69 S. W. 800; Hopkins County v. St. Bernard Coal Co. 114 Ky. 153, 70 S. W. 289.

Section 5 of article 11, Constitution of Texas, prohibited any city from creating any debt unless at the same time provision was made to assess and collect annually a sufficient sum to pay the interest thereon and create a sinking fund of at least two per cent thereon, and it is held by the Texas courts that a debt contracted by a city for current expenses was not within the class of debts contemplated by that section of its Constitution. Dwyer v. Brenham, 65 Tex. 526; Terrell v. Dessaint, 71 Tex. 770, 9 S. W. 593; Biddle v. Terrell, 82 Tex. 335, 18 S. W. 691.

Other decisions under similar constitutional and statutory provisions, holding the views herein expressed, are as follows: L.R.A.1918C.

Sackett v. New Albany, 88 Ind. 473, 45 Am. Rep. 467; Thomas v. Burlington, 69 Iowa, 140, 28 N. W. 480; Leonard v. Long Island City, 65 Hun, 621, 47 N. Y. S. R. 761, 20 N. Y. Supp. 26; McGrath v. Grout, 171 N. Y. 7, 63 N. E. 547; Upton v. Strommer, 101 Minn. 97, 111 N. W. 956; Barnard v. Knox County (C. C.) 2 L.R.A. 426, 37 Fed. 563; Laycock v. Baton Rouge, 35 La. Ann. 479; State ex rel. Marchand v. New Orleans, 37 La. Ann. 13.

The Constitution of Colorado (§ 2, art. 11) contained a similar provision which was construed by the supreme court of that state to be absolute. People ex rel. Seeley v. May, 9 Colo. 80, 10 Pac. 641. This construction was also given to the Constitution of that state by the Supreme Court of the United States in Lake County v. Rollins, 130 U. S. 662, 32 L. ed. 1060, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 651. This has led to some curious makeshifts by the legislature of Colorado which have been approved by the supreme court of the state. Following the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in Lake County v. Rollins, supra, the supreme court of Missouri in Barnard v. Knox County, 105 Mo. 382, 13 L.R.A. 244, 16 S. W. 917, in effect overruled its former opinion in the case of Potter v. Douglas County, supra.

It is evident from the conflicting constructions which have been placed upon similar provisions that it is possible to give different meanings and effect thereto, and in this situation we are required to apply the rules of judicial determination that prevail in such situation, and the rule applicable here is that effect must be given if possible to each and every clause of the Constitution, and it should be the aim of the court to adopt a construction which will render every provision operative, for it is scarcely conceivable that any portion of the Constitution was not intended to have some operation and effect. The Constitution did not create the state, but, on the contrary, is itself a creature of the people and the instrument of their convenience, designed for their protection and to secure enjoyment of the rights and powers which they possessed before the Constitution was written, and is merely the concrete expression of the will of the people, based upon the pre-existing condition of laws, rights, habits, and modes of thought which had prevailed, and was an enumeration of certain fundamental principles that should continue thereafter. Cooley, Const. Lim. 37-58.

In addition to the protection of life, liberty, and property and the conservation of the public peace, health, and safety, there are certain other functions of government which are elementary and indestructible, such, for example, as the administration of justice in the courts and the maintenance of a public school system for the education of all the children residing within the state; and to permit the performance of these mandatory duties to depend upon the making of provision therefor by certain subordinate municipal officers would render the life of the state and the security of the citizen precarious indeed. In many instances the amount necessary for a proper performance of such duties could not be reasonably foreseen, for it is not always possible to tell in advance how much will be required. The net result of the decisions holding that constitutional provisions such as article 10, § 26, do not apply to those liabilities which are not voluntarily incurred by the municipality, is that they are careful to limit the application of the rule to those liabilities which are imposed upon the municipality by the superior power of the sovereignty, as expressed in the Constitution or valid acts of the legislature. The items claimed were earned by plaintiff in the performance of duties imposed upon him by the state in which he had no discretion, and were not included within the limitations of article 10, § 26.

The judgment of the trial court in Re Application of State to Issue Bonds, supra, was reversed and the case again reached this court (40 Okla. 145, 136 Pac. 1104, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 399), where the rule announced upon the original appeal was adhered to. In Campbell v. State, 23 Okla. 109, 99 Pac. 778, plaintiff sought to enjoin the board of county commissioners and the county clerk of Washita county from issuing certain warrants in payment of semi-annual instalments upon a written contract for a courthouse, and it was held that § 2, art. 8, chap. 32, Session Laws of Oklahoma 1897, which authorized the court fund to be used for an annual rental for courthouses and jails, and authorized an additional levy not exceeding 3 mills for the purposes enumerated in said section, was repugnant to § 26, art. 10, of the Constitution, and the issuance of such warrants was enjoined. In Kerr v. State, 33 Okla. 110, 124 Pac. 284, mandamus was sought to compel the county clerk to issue and deliver certain warrants for claims which had been allowed by the board of county commissioners in excess of 80 per cent and within 100 per cent of the estimated income and revenue for the year in which said claims had accrued. The issuance of the writ was objected to on the ground that by § 1, chap. 16, Session Laws 1895 (§ 1683, Comp. Laws 1909), a limitation was placed upon the amount of warrants which could be issued not to exceed 80 per cent of the amount levied for the fund against which said warrant was drawn. The question decided in Shannon v. State, 33 Okla. 293, 125 Pac. 1106, was that by virtue of § 9, chap. 80, Laws 1910-11, entitled "An Act Relating to the Issuance of Warrants and Certificates of Indebtedness," the board of county commissioners was without authority to allow and approve a claim against any fund of the county, or order a warrant therefor issued on such fund, where, during the fiscal year in which the claim was presented, claims had already been allowed and approved on such fund equal to the estimate made and approved by the excise board for such fund for the current fiscal year; and this was held to be true, although there was to the credit of such fund an unexpended balance derived from the revenues during the preceding year. In State ex rel. Decker v. Stanfield, 34 Okla. 524, 126 Pac. 239, mandamus was sought against defendant, as judge, requiring him to hold a term of court in Creek county. The writ was allowed requiring defendant to hold a term of court for the purpose of transacting business which might be carried on without imposing a charge on the court fund, or to impanel a jury, or incur any expense which would be a charge against that fund. In none of the cases heretofore decided by this court has the precise question here involved been presented nor determined. The case of Re Application of State to Issue Bonds, supra, is the nearest in point in principle. While in some of the cases there is a discussion which would seem to indicate that, in the opinion of the writer, obligations of the character here involved would be invalid, the decision of this point was not necessary to the determination of the case. In Shannon v. State, supra, relator was county jailer of Creek county, and sought mandamus to compel the board of county commissioners to approve certain claims for boarding and keeping state and county prisoners in his custody. It was admitted in that case that the county was indebted to him in the sum claimed; that the claim was correct and due by the county and a proper charge against the contingent fund. The court in the opinion did not question this concession of counsel, but simply held that the board could not be compelled by mandamus to allow said claims, nor make payment thereof.

The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By an information filed in the superior court of Spokane county the appellant Frank Harris was charged, jointly with one Karl Size, with the crime of robbery. The cause was brought on for trial on December 14, 1916, each of the defendants appearing by separate counsel. The trial lasted until December 17, 1916, when the jury returned a verdict of guilty as to the appellant and disagreed as to the defendant Size. Thereafter a judgment of guilty was pronounced against the appellant, and he was sentenced to a term in the state penitentiary.

At the appropriate stage of the case the appellant moved for a new trial, basing his motion on the ground, among others, of irregularity in the proceedings of the court and jury during the progress of the trial, in that the jurors were permitted to separate without the consent of the defendant and to remain separated for long periods of

Note. — Aside from STATE v. HARRIS, no reported case has been found which has considered the question of the right to permit a separation of a jury according to sexes.

In the absence of a statute regulating this question, there can be little doubt but that in jurisdictions where women are eligible as jurors the rule adopted in the HARRIS CASE will prevail. Jurisdictions which recognize the right to permit a separation from necessity will, of course, find no trouble on that score. Jurisdictions, if any, which do not recognize such rule will be forced to L.R.A.1918C.

permit the separation under the rule of decency and propriety.

time. The court denied the motion, and whether it erred in so doing is the only question presented on this appeal.

The record discloses that the jury was composed of one woman and eleven men. During the intermissions of the trial permitted by the court and the noon recesses, the woman juror was permitted to retire to the judge's chambers, where she remained until the incoming of the court. The record makes it clear that during these periods the ingresses to the room remained closed under the supervision of duly sworn bailiffs, and that no communication during these periods was had by anyone with the juror. The men jurors retired to the regular jury room during these periods. Nothing is shown as to the disposition of the jury during the adjournment from day to day; yet it appears that two nights intervened between the commencement and the conclusion of the action. It was the failure to keep the jury together during the intermissions and recesses mentioned that constitutes the separation of which complaint is made.

Our own cases on what will and what will not constitute a separation of the jury may not be entirely harmonious. We think, however, it is unnecessary to review them here. In none of them is it denied that separation from necessity is permissible, and in some of them the rule is distinctly recognized. See State v. Burns, 19 Wash. 52, 52 Pac. 316; State v. Strodemier, 41 Wash. 159, 111 Am. St. Rep. 1012, 83 Pac. 22.

It is our opinion that the separation here complained of can be justified on this latter ground. The statute making women eligible to jury service of itself necessitated, and was of itself, a change in the existing system relating to the separation of juries. In trials protracted over considerable periods of time the rules of society, propriety, and common decency require that mixed juries be allowed to separate according to sexes at stated intervals during its progress.

It may be questioned, moreover, whether the courts have not placed a too narrow construction on the word "separate," as used in the statutes. The object and purpose of keeping them sequestered is, and has always been, to keep them from being influenced with reference to the matters given them in charge, by ulterior practices. This purpose is as well accomplished when the jury are kept singly under the charge of sworn officers of the court as it is when they are kept under like officers in a body.

But, giving the defendant the benefit of the more rigid rules, it is clear that he was not prejudiced in fact by the separation here complained of, and we are not able to conclude that the separation was so far unnecessary as to require us to hold that he was prejudiced in law.

The judgment is affirmed.

Landlord and tenant — judgment of unlawful detainer — eviction.

Voluntary abandonment of the premises by a tenant because of the entry of a judgment against him in unlawful detainer proceedings, which is reversed on appeal, does not constitute an eviction which will entitle him to damages against the landlord.

Angellotti, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for damages for the alleged unlawful eviction of plaintiff by his landlord from premises held and occupied by him as a tenant under a lease. Judgment was given for the sum of $10,449, and the appeal is from such judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. All but $586 of the amount awarded was on account of the value of the unexpired term of the lease (fixed at $11,544), such $586 being for expense and damage incurred in defending the unlawful detainer action.

The only alleged eviction found was the prosecution by the landlord to judgment in the superior court of an unlawful detainer proceeding on account of the alleged violation by the tenant of a covenant of the lease, the judgment entered therein declaring the lease canceled and forfeited, and adjudging that the tenant "restore" and the landlord "have" possession of the demised premises, and that the landlord recover from the tenant $2,250 damages, $200 attorney fees, and $30 costs. The tenant appealed from the judgment, staying by bond the enforcement of the judgment pending appeal in so far as the money recovery was concerned, but not seeking any stay as to the portion of the judgment relative to possession of the demised premises. In the complaint it was alleged that by the judgment the tenant was required to "and did surrender possession of said premises" to the landlord. By the answer, it was denied that "the tenant was obliged to surrender possession of the premises, "or that he was deprived of the possession thereof by either of defendants." It was further alleged that without asking for any stay, "and before the issuance of any writ of execution or assistance whatever," the tenant "abandoned the possession of the said premises." The trial court found simply that the tenant, "in compliance with said judgment was required to and did surrender possession of said demised premises" to the landlord. This finding is assailed as being without sufficient support in the evidence. The was no evidence whatever as to the circumstances attending the change of possession; nothing tending to show that the tenant, without the issuance of any writ and without any demand by the landlord, did not abandon possession to the landlord upon the entry of the judgment. For all the purposes of this appeal it must be assumed that he did actually abandon the premises without being compelled to do so under any process issued and served under the judgment in the unlawful detainer proceeding. On appeal, the judgment in the unlawful detainer action was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. The landlord then tendered possession of the premises to the tenant for the unexpired portion of the term, but the tender was not accepted. The unlawful detainer action was then dismissed by the landlord. In view of the record it must also be assumed for all the purposes of this appeal that the unlawful detainer action was commenced and prosecuted to the end in good faith and without malice. The judgment herein was for the amount found to be the full value of the unexpired term at the time the tenant surrendered possession, plus the amount of the expenses of the tenant in defending his possession, less certain counterclaims aggregating $1,891.

The theory upon which this judgment is sought to be sustained is that the prosecution by the landlord of the unlawful detainer action to a judgment in his favor, which judgment, by its terms, required the tenant to deliver possession to the landlord, entitled the tenant to treat the conduct of the landlord as a breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment and an unlawful eviction, with the result that not only could he regard the lease upon voluntary surrender of possession as at an end, and himself exempt from liability for further rent, etc., thereunder, but, also, treating the lease as still in force, recover as damages the value of the unexpired term thereunder, in the event that he succeeded on his appeal from the judgment.

Consideration of the authorities satisfies us that such a theory finds no substantial support therein. It may be assumed purely for the purposes of this decision that, if the tenant is actually ousted from possession under process issued upon such a judgment, he may treat such ouster as a breach of the implied covenant for quiet enjoyment, and recover his damages in the event of a reversal of the judgment. Certain states have statutes providing for the recovery of such damages, among which is New York, where the statute provides substantially that, if the final order in such a summary proceeding is reversed upon appeal, the person dispossessed may maintain an action to recover the damage sustained by the dispossession. Even under such a statute it has been held that actual dispossession of the tenant by the landlord is essential to a right of recovery, and that, where the tenant removes from the premises without the taking of any steps on the part of the landlord to enforce the judgment, he cannot maintain the action. See Halperin v. Henry, 144 App. Div. 658, 129 N. Y. Supp. 599; State, Coe, Prosecutor, v. Haines, 44 N. J. L. 134. There is no such statute in this state. It seems to us that wherever the tenant's claim is based solely on an alleged deprivation of actual possession, and is for the consequent damages, no other rule can logically or reasonably be applied.

It is elementary that the covenant for quiet enjoyment goes only to the possession, and that to constitute a violation thereof, as said in Levitzky v. Canning, 33 Cal. 290, "there must be some act of molestation, affecting, to his prejudice, the possession of the covenantee." It is true that a complete physical ouster of the tenant is not always essential to an eviction, and it has often been declared that any wrongful act of the landlord which directly results in depriving the tenant of the full beneficial enjoyment of the premises is an eviction. In Levitzky v. Canning, supra, where the tenant was never actually ousted from or abandoned the premises, the slandering of the tenant's possession, the giving out and pretending publicly that the tenant had no right to possession, and the bringing of two actions at law to recover possession from the tenant and his subtenants, under the pretense that the lease had expired (one of which actions was dismissed by the landlord, and the other of which resulted in judgment for the tenant), with the result that the subtenants quit the premises by reason of their doubts caused thereby as to the lawfulness of the tenant's possession, leaving them vacant, and he was unable to let to other parties, were held to disturb and interrupt the possession of the tenant to his injury, in violation of the covenant for quiet enjoyment, to the same extent as if he had taken plaintiff's tenants by the shoulders and forcibly ejected them. But that there must be an actual deprivation of the beneficial enjoyment of the premises to constitute an eviction was emphatically stated, and the case is not authority for the proposition that the mere institution and prosecution, by the landlord, even to judgment, of an unlawful detainer action, in good faith and without malice, can be held to constitute an invasion of the beneficial enjoyment of the premises guaranteed the tenant by his covenant for quiet enjoyment. This was clearly and distinctly shown in the later case of Agar v. Winslow, 123 Cal. 587, 69 Am. St. Rep. 84, 56 Pac. 422, in which there was involved the question whether the previous institution of an action in ejectment by the landlord constituted an eviction of the tenant. As substantially stated in that case, the essential thing in Levitzky v. Canning, supra, was "that the acts complained of as amounting to an eviction had the effect to make the tenants of the lessee quit the premises, leaving them vacant." In the case at bar, if the tenant had been actually ousted from possession by the landlord, under process issued upon the unlawful detainer judgment, it might well be argued that Levitzky v. Canning, supra, required a conclusion, contrary to very respectable authority, that there had been a wrongful deprivation of possession by the landlord, constituting a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment. But, as we have seen, that element must be held to be lacking here.

So long, certainly, as there is no disturbance of the tenant's beneficial enjoyment of the premises caused thereby, the right of a landlord, acting in perfect good faith and without malice, to prosecute an action in the courts for the purpose of obtaining a determination of the question whether the tenant has not forfeited his term because of violation of some covenant of the lease, without making himself amenable to the tenant in damage, cannot well be disputed. Indeed, there is much authority which goes further in favor of the landlord's rights in this respect. It is substantially said in 2 Tiffany, Landlord and Tenant, § 289, that the general rule is that, in order to make one liable for the institution of a civil suit, it must have been with malice and without probable cause, and that, under this rule, a landlord would not be liable to his tenant for damage to the latter arising from his wrongful institution of a summary proceeding to recover possession, unless it was instituted maliciously and without probable cause. See also Porter v. Johnson, 96 Ga. 145, 23 S. E. 123; Hegan Mantel Co. v. Cook, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 427, 57 S. W. 929. It has been declared that an entry by the landlord by virtue of summary process under the Landlord and Tenant Act for nonpayment of rent is not an eviction (24 Cyc. 1132, note); and also, substantially, that the right to damage in such cases exists only where the dispossession proceedings have been instituted maliciously and without probable cause; or where the process has been used excessively or for a purpose which it was not intended by law to effect, as in cases of abuse of process; or when expressly provided by statute. See 24 Cyc. 1462. But certainly there can be no eviction or liability in damage on the L.R.A.1918C.

part of the landlord in such a case so long as there is no disturbance of the tenant's beneficial enjoyment of the premises. The mere pendency of the suit constitutes no such disturbance. The claim of learned counsel for plaintiff is based principally upon the fact that here a judgment was obtained in the superior court which, by its terms, required restoration of the premises to the landlord. It seems to us that this fact does not assist, and that the utmost that may reasonably be claimed by the tenant under these circumstances is that the landlord may not enforce his judgment by actually ousting the tenant from possession under the judgment, without making himself liable for the damage resulting from this deprivation of possession, in the event of a reversal of the judgment. Until the landlord does so enforce the judgment, he does not actually disturb the possession and beneficial enjoyment, and the case in this respect is just as it was before entry of judgment. The landlord is not compelled to carry the judgment into execution simply because it has been given and entered. He may well decide to withhold execution until the final determination of his action,—until it has been finally determined that the tenant has forfeited his term, and that he may treat the term as forfeited and safely enforce his judgment. The tenant has no right to assume from the mere entry of judgment that the landlord intends to do otherwise. Authorities are, of course, ample to the effect that the tenant may accept not only the prosecution to judgment of such an action, but also the mere institution thereof, as such an election on the part of the landlord to terminate the lease that he will be justified in treating the lease as ended, and may yield possession of the premises and be free from further liability under the terms of the lease. Such is the meaning of the declaration in § 675 of Underhill on Landlord and Tenant, relied on by plaintiff, where Jennings v. Bond, 14 Ind. App. 282, 42 N. E. 957, is cited, the same being an action for rent after a suit in ejectment maintained by landlord and after a subsequent offered surrender of the premises by the tenant. This, however, is an entirely different proposition from the one involved in this case. Here the tenant so yielding possession without being required to do so is insisting that the act of the landlord in prosecuting his action to judgment shall be treated as an eviction, and the landlord held liable to him for any loss suffered from his failure to enjoy the remainder of the term. To our minds neither reason nor authority warrants the holding that such position is correct, where the tenant actually abandons the possession without being compelled to do so under any process issued and served under the judgment in the unlawful detainer proceeding, and the proceeding was brought and maintained in good faith and without malice. As we read 1 Taylor on Landlord and Tenant, § 311, and 2 Tiffany on Landlord and Tenant, §§ 184, 185, we find nothing contrary to this view.

Decisions to the effect that the establishment of a title paramount to that of the landlord by decree of a court of competent jurisdiction warrants the tenant in yielding possession to the true owner without waiting to be dispossessed under a writ of possession, and in treating the judgment as an eviction by title paramount, are, of course, not in point. In Mack v. Patchin, 29 How. Pr. 20, id. 42 N. Y. 167, 1 Am. Rep. 506, a case strongly relied on by plaintiff, the tenant was compelled to yield possession by virtue of a writ of assistance issued in foreclosure of mortgage proceedings, the mortgage being prior in right to his interest as lessee. The writ had been issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff, who "by virtue of it demanded the possession of" the tenant. It appeared further that the landlord had expedited, if he did not instigate, the foreclosure of the mortgage, and was a joint purchaser on the mortgage sale, and a joint petitioner, with the other purchaser, for the writ of assistance. In short, he had apparently actually connived, for his own benefit, in having the tenant dispossessed by paramount title.

We are not interested here in determining just what acts of a landlord interfering with the beneficial enjoyment by the tenant of the premises, short of actual physical ouster, will warrant the latter in abandoning possession, and treating the conduct of the landlord as an unlawful eviction, with the right to the damage consequent upon being deprived of the remainder of his term. It is sufficient for the purposes of this case to hold, as we do, that the mere prosecution to judgment by the landlord of an unlawful detainer action, in good faith and without malice, for the purpose of obtaining a judicial determination of the question whether he is entitled to possession by reason of some default on the part of the tenant, and possession in the event that the determination is in his favor, is not such an act.

From what we have said it necessarily follows that, upon the record before us, the recovery against appellant cannot be sustained in whole or in part. It appears unnecessary to consider other points made by her for a reversal.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

Annotation—Liability of landlord who brings an unfounded action to dispossess tenant.

It is a general rule that the courts are open for the purpose of determining the existence of rights to which any person may conceive himself entitled. If a person brings an action in good faith and without malice, he is not liable beyond the costs that may be assessed against him in the action, however unfounded the action may be. It is only when he prosecutes an action maliciously and without probable cause that he renders himself liable in damages. Liability for the malicious prosecution of civil actions is sometimes limited to cases in which there has been an interference with the person or property. The present note is concerned with the question whether these general rules apply to and govern the liability of a landlord who has brought an unfounded suit against his tenant. A contract relation exists between a landlord and his tenant; the contract, that is, the lease, usually contains covenants. It may be stated generally at this point in the discussion that, if the action of the landlord amounts to a breach of his covenants, he renders himself liable therefor irrespectively of the existence of malice or lack of probable cause. In the absence of a breach in the contractual relation existing between the parties, the general rule applies, and the landlord is not liable, in the absence of malice or lack of probable cause. It is assumed in the foregoing statement that the landlord has taken no action but what was regular under the proceedings brought by him; he may by taking illegal action render himself liable on this ground.

An action in damages by the tenant may therefore be based upon one or both of two grounds: (a) It may be based upon malice and lack of probable cause in the landlord's action; or (b) it may be based upon the theory that the landlord's action constituted a breach of the contractual relation existing between the landlord and tenant.

In the absence of a breach of contract or trespass, the tenant must show malice and lack of probable cause to maintain an action against his landlord.<sup>1</sup> The bringing of forcible detainer proceedings does not entitle the tenant to recover damages upon the proceedings terminating in favor of the tenant, in the absence of malice and lack of probable cause.<sup>2</sup> Nor does the landlord render himself liable in damages for bringing an action to determine the validity of a contract for a lease under which the tenant is in possession.<sup>3</sup> If the landlord does, before the expiration of the term, sue out a dispossessory warrant and cause the tenant to be evicted, maliciously and without probable cause, he is liable to the tenant.<sup>4</sup>

It being assumed in BLACK v. KNIGHT, ante, 319, that the landlord's action was commenced and prosecuted to the end in good faith and without malice, that action was based upon the theory that the bringing of the action was a breach of the contractual relation existing between the landlord and tenant, more specifically that it was a breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment and an unlawful eviction, for which the tenant was entitled to recover damages. It has been held that an action brought by the landlord which results in a breach of his covenant in the lease renders him liable to his tenant in damages irrespectively of malice or lack of probable cause.<sup>5</sup> The question thus remains in BLACK v.

KNIGHT, whether the landlord's action was a breach of this contractual relation. The court holds that the action was not a breach of the contractual relation, the tenant having voluntarily surrendered possession upon an adverse verdict in the trial court, which upon appeal was reversed; the landlord's action is held to be neither a breach of his covenant for quiet enjoyment nor an unlawful eviction. The covenant most frequently involved in such actions is that of quiet enjoyment. What amounts to a breach of this covenant, entitling the tenant to an action in damages therefor, is a question that can be answered best by references to the cases. It may be stated generally, to use the language of BLACK v. KNIGHT in quoting from an earlier California case,<sup>6</sup> that "it is elementary that the covenant for quiet enjoyment goes only to the possession, and that to constitute a violation thereof, . . . 'there must be some act of molestation, affecting, to his prejudice, the possession of the covenantee.'" It has been held that an action which proves to be unfounded, to recover possession of the leased premises under the pretense that the lease has expired, where, as a result, subtenants of the lessee quit the premises and the lessee is put to expense in defending, is a breach of the landlord's covenant of quiet enjoyment.<sup>6</sup> For such breach of the covenant, the landlord is liable to the tenant in damages.<sup>7</sup>

The question is sometimes discussed from the standpoint of whether the action constitutes an eviction. It has been

Hegan Mantel Co. v. Alford (1908) — Ky. —, 114 S. W. 290. In this case it was held that an action for malicious prosecution will not lie merely because the action upon which it is founded was instituted maliciously; it must also appear that it was instituted without probable cause. As the judgment of the lower court in the forcible detainer proceeding was in favor of the landlord, it was held that probable cause was conclusively shown although that judgment was reversed upon appeal.

<sup>3</sup> Aull v. Bowling Green Opera House Co. (1908) 130 Ky. 789, 114 S. W. 284. In this case there had been a judicial sale of property to a number of purchasers; the lease of a tenant in possession of the property being about to expire, he made an agreement for another lease with one of the purchasers, who claimed to own a majority interest. Subsequently, a corporation was organized by the purchasers and the title L.R.A.1918C.

to the property assigned to the corporation, which asked for a writ of possession in the judicial proceeding in which the property had been sold. The tenant appeared and offered to file his petition asking to be made a party to the action, claiming that he had a lease. This was refused by the trial court, but upon appeal the judgment of the trial court was reversed. Subsequently, the corporation obtained a writ of forcible detainer against the tenant, and by agreement possession was surrendered, and thereafter an action was brought by the corporation for the rent, in which the defendant sought to set off the damages incurred by him in defending the previous proceeding.

held that the bringing of action which does not disturb the beneficial enjoyment of the lessee does not amount to an eviction which will relieve the tenant of the payment of rent, although a subtenant of the lessee does not thereafter pay rent to the lessee, he, however, being under bond so that the rent is secure.<sup>8</sup>

That there is no eviction where the premises are voluntarily surrendered, although the judgment in the trial court directs that the landlord have possession, is the theory of the decision of BLACK v. KNIGHT. It has been held, however, that there is an eviction where a tenant against whom the landlord brought an action to dispossess on the ground of holding over surrendered possession of the premises under protest, so as to entitle the tenant to damages if he was not in fact a tenant holding over.<sup>9</sup> This decision is based upon the theory that the landlord has breached his contract with the tenant. In the absence of a contractual relation, there can, of course, be no recovery for breach of contract.<sup>10</sup>

Where the landlord has issued process on the judgment, and caused the tenant to be dispossessed, the tenant is entitled to recover damages if the judgment under which the writ of possession was awarded is reversed.<sup>11</sup> Such a dispossession is an eviction.<sup>12</sup> A difference of opinion exists as to this, however, and it has been held that a tenant who has been evicted by virtue of a writ issued in a dispossessory proceeding before a justice has no right of action against the landlord, although the judgment of the justice is subsequently reversed upon appeal.<sup>13</sup> The Pennsylvania court<sup>14</sup> first considers the action as one for breach of a contract of lease, and states that the evidence fails to show any breach of contract, unless the securing of judgment ordering execution to be issued and the receiving possession of the property from the officer who executed the writ constitutes a breach. Continuing, the court states that, "if the contract was such that the defendant had no right to possession, the plaintiff had opportunity to defend before the justice. The matter in dispute was adjudicated and enforced by execution." And the court concludes that the tenant "may be entitled to remedy, but not in this form; that is, if the action is to be treated as a case for breach of contract with nothing to constitute a breach save the former suit between the <sup>9</sup> Smith v. Eubanks (1884) 72 Ga. 280. The court, referring to the proceeding to dispossess the tenant, stated: "It was simply the ordinary process legally authorized to eject a tenant holding over. A counter affidavit was put in and bond given by plaintiffs; no harshness of any sort was resorted to; it was simply a test of the question, according to law, whether the plaintiffs were tenants holding over or not. The plaintiffs declined the contest, and thus that proceeding was ended by their relinquishing possession under protest, according to their own evidence. That did not deprive them, it is true, of recovering their legitimate damages flowing from the breach of contract when evicted, and by reason of the eviction, if they gave up under protest." The principal dispute in this connection was as to the measure of damages, the tenant claiming that he was entitled to damages because of evidence of oppressiveness in the proceeding to dispossess, a claim that was denied.

In Ashcroft v. Bourne (1832) 3 Barn. & Ad. 684, 110 Eng. Reprint, 250, a landlord who had made complaint before a justice under the statute relating to deserted and unoccupied tenements, and had been by the justices put into possession of the premises, was held not liable to the tenant in an action of trespass, where upon appeal the judgment of the justices was reversed and the tenant again put into possession of the premises. The court, after referring to the proceeding, states that the landlord was put into possession of the premises by act of the law, and "he is not a trespasser. It turns out that the justices had mistaken the law; but it would be hard if the landlord, who had submitted his case fairly and honestly to them, should therefore be deemed a trespasser ab initio. If it had appeared that the proceedings had been maliciously commenced or persisted in, that might have been the ground of an action on account of his having misled the justices; but in the present case this is not imputed."

parties." The court then considers the action as one for malicious prosecution, and states that the reversal of the judgment of the justice did not settle that the landlord maliciously brought the suit, and continues: "The judgment of the justice established the existence of a cause of action; and whether that judgment was discontinued after appeal to the common pleas, or was reversed when brought into this court, these plaintiffs have no case for maliciously obtaining judgment and enforcing it by execution, unless there be proof of an excessive use of the process." There being no claim that there had been an excessive use of the process, the liability of the landlord to damages on this theory was denied also.

Some statutes expressly provide for damages for eviction in summary proceedings where the judgment against the tenant is subsequently reversed.<sup>15</sup> But under such a statute a tenant who voluntarily removed from the premises on the rendering of a decision in favor of the landlord in summary proceedings instituted to obtain possession of the property was held to have no right of action for damages for such dispossession, although the judgment in the summary proceedings was reversed upon appeal.<sup>16</sup> And under a statute authorizing the damages to be assessed upon the appeal from the decision of the justice, it has been held that no damages can be recovered by a tenant who has been dispossessed, where the justice's judgment is reversed upon certiorari, the court stating that if the tenant desires to recover damages, his remedy is by appeal.<sup>17</sup>

A writ of sequestration is provided for in some jurisdictions, by virtue of which the possession is delivered to the landlord upon his filing a bond conditioned to pay all damages that may be awarded against him, and costs, in case sequestration is wrongfully issued. Under such a statute a landlord who has obtained a writ of sequestration has been held liable in damages, where it was determined that the writ was wrongfully issued.<sup>18</sup>

When the tenant has been evicted by legal process under a judgment which is unreversed, his right of action for such eviction depends upon different considerations from those which govern the case of a reversed judgment. A judgment in summary proceedings has been treated the same as a judgment in any other proceeding, that is, it has been held to be conclusive as to the rights of the parties and to protect the landlord in any regular action that he may take thereunder. A tenant who has been ejected under a writ issued in an action by the landlord to obtain possession has no right of action against his landlord for injuries suffered through the legal execution of the writ.<sup>19</sup> It has been held that a tenant who has been evicted under a writ issued in a dispossession proceeding cannot maintain trespass quare clausum fregit against his landlord.<sup>20</sup> But if the proceedings are irregular,<sup>21</sup> as, for instance, a proceeding in which the essential jurisdictional facts are not averred, a judgment therein is no protection to the landlord; an evic-

The action in this case was by the tenant and his wife against the landlord to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the wife by reason of the ejectment. The court further holds in this case that the landlord was responsible for any illegal act done by those parties whom he specially employed, or by himself: that as to illegal acts done by the officer, who was the proper party to execute the writ, the landlord was liable for whatever was done either expressly or impliedly by his direction.

A grantee of property who dispossessed a tenant thereof under a warrant which is

tion of the tenant is illegal and the landlord is liable in damages.<sup>22</sup> Or if, in serving the writ, the statute has not been complied with, the parties, including the landlord, are trespassers, and liable to the tenant in damages.<sup>23</sup> A landlord has been held liable where the writ of possession was prematurely issued.<sup>24</sup> And where the tenant is dispossessed by virtue of an irregular writ, the landlord is liable in damages.<sup>25</sup> A tenant who has been dispossessed by virtue of a writ issued upon a judgment against her husband has a cause of action against her landlord.<sup>26</sup> It has also been held that an affidavit used in a summary proceeding which is decided in favor of the tenant cannot be used as the foundation of a new proceeding, and when so used and the tenant is turned out of possession, the subsequent proceedings are void and trespass lies against the landlord.<sup>27</sup> Some statutes confine the tenant's remedy, where it appears that the landlord was entitled to possession, but where there has been irregularity in the proceeding, to an action on the case founded on the special damage arising to him from the irregularity or informality; where no special damage is alleged under such a statute, there can be no recovery.<sup>28</sup>

Where the judgment in the summary proceedings is treated as conclusive, and such judgment is unreversed, the distinctive question treated in this note does not arise. The liability of the landlord, if any exists, is based not upon the bringing of an unfounded action, but upon irregular or wrongful use of process. But a judgment in summary proceedings is not conclusive in all jurisdictions. Some statutes provide that, where the landlord has recovered possession of real property by summary proceedings because of nonpayment of rent, the lessee may within a stated time, by tendering the rent in arrears with interest and costs of action, and performing all other covenants, be restored to possession according to the terms of the original lease.<sup>29</sup> A tender made by the tenant after judgment in favor of the landlord, and before eviction, the tender being kept good by him, has been held to entitle him to retain possession; hence eviction by the landlord by writ under his judgment was held wrongful and entitled the defendant to recover damages; the statutory remedy of restitution was held not to be exclusive.<sup>30</sup> It is expressly provided in some statutes that a judgment in forcible entry and detainer shall not bar an action of trespass between the same parties respecting the same tenement.<sup>31</sup> Under such a statute a tenant who has been ejected by a writ sued out by his landlord in a summary proceeding has a right of action against his landlord for any wrong or oppression inflicted in enforcing the writ.<sup>32</sup> It has been held that a tenant ejected in a forcible detainer proceeding brought by a subsequent lessee at the instigation of the landlord has the right to show that such eviction was wrongful and recover damages of the landlord.<sup>33</sup>

But a judgment obtained in an action by a landlord to dispossess his tenant was held not to be a trespass which would sustain an action by the tenant, who had removed from the premises after an officer of the court had told him that if he did not remove he would be removed by force, but before the officer had come with the writ to effect the removal.<sup>34</sup> The court states that the removal of the tenant by virtue of the warrant to dispossess is the act which, if shown to be unlawful, becomes the basis of the action of trespass, and as this act had not taken place there was no trespass.

COMMERCIAL NATIONAL BANK OF LOS ANGELES, Appt.

(— Cal. —, 169 Pac. 1007.)

Check — discrepancy between words and figures.

1. A check for "$500.00 Five and no/100 dollars" is void for uncertainty, and cannot be explained by evidence as to the intention of the parties.

For other cases, see Evidence, VI. e, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Pleading — denial of surplusage.

2. Denial of an allegation in a suit to recover the amount paid on a void check that by inadvertence and mistake plaintiff wrote the figures 500, instead of 5, raises no issue on which evidence is admissible, where the check shows a fatal variance between words and figures on its face, since the allegation is mere surplusage.

(December 27, 1917.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, in an action brought to recover an amount alleged to have been paid by defendant on a void check. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Paul Burks and F. J. Held, Jr., for appellant:

A check is a contract, which must be construed according to the exclusive rules of construction prescribed by the Code.

A check is substantially the same as an inland bill of exchange and, in general, is governed by the law applicable to bills of exchange and promissory notes, and decisions as to bills of exchange are applicable to cases involving checks.

It was made mandatory upon the court to receive parol evidence for the purpose of ascertaining and explaining the intent of the maker "by reference to the circumstances under which it was made."

It was the imperative duty of the trial court, in view of the issue joined, to receive such evidence as would have enabled it to "place itself in the position of the parties, and consider the circumstances, to ascertain their intent at the time of the execution of the contract," by taking the instrument before it as a whole.

The figures "$500.00" as they appear in said check are not "marginal figures," because they appear in the body of and constitute a part of that instrument equally as important as any of its words.

Messrs. Kemp, Mitchell, & Silberberg for respondent.

Angellotti, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by a depositor against a bank in which he had a commercial account, to recover money claimed to have been improperly paid by the bank on a purported check drawn by him against the bank, in favor of one Russell, and improperly charged to his account. Russell was not made a party to the action. Plaintiff obtained judgment for the amount claimed ($495). This is an appeal by defendant from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The appeal is in this court by transfer hereto after decision of the district court of appeal of the second appellate district.

On May 7, 1914, the plaintiff drew and delivered to D. W. Russell, the payee therein named, the check here involved. It was in the following form.

Los Angeles, Cal., May 7, 1914. No. 379
Commercial National Bank of Los Angeles:
16-17

Pay to the order of D. W. Russell $500.00
Five and no/100 dollars. D. C. Payne.

On May 9, 1914, the check was presented to defendant bank for payment, and the bank, with full notice and knowledge of the variance in the check between the written and "marginal figures," refused to pay the same. On May 13, 1914, the check was again presented for payment, and the bank thereupon paid the sum of $500 thereon, and charged plaintiff's account in said sum. At the time of said payment plaintiff had on deposit a sum exceeding $500. Upon these facts, alleged in the complaint, established by the evidence without conflict, and found by the trial court, judgment was given for plaintiff for $495.

Of course the bank was authorized to pay out money on plaintiff's account only upon authorization from plaintiff so to do. Janin v. London & S. F. Bank, 92 Cal. 22, 14 L.R.A. 320, 27 Am. St. Rep. 82, 27 Pac. 1100. The check hereinbefore set forth is the only authorization relied on.

Clearly there is no rule of construction which would warrant this check being read as one for $500, rather than as one for only $5.

It might well be argued that it must be construed as a check for only $5. This argument might not be sustainable under the rule of such cases as Poorman v. Mills, 39 Cal. 345, 350, 2 Am. Rep. 451, to the effect that, if there is a difference in the sum stated in the body of the check or bill and that stated in figures in the margin or superscription, the words written in the body must control without regard to the figures in the margin or superscription. The idea underlying this rule appears to be that such a marginal note or superscription is but a memorandum, constituting no part of the body of the bill or check, and that what is clearly specified in the body must control. It is said with much force that this rule can have no application here for the reason that the figures "500.00" in this check do not constitute a marginal note or superscription, but are, equally with the written words and figures "Five and no/100 dollars," a part of the body of the check. But there is a general rule of construction recognized by some of the authorities to the effect that where both written words and figures are used in a contract to express the same number, and there is a discrepancy between the two, the written words must prevail over the figures. See 2 Elliott, Contr. § 1527; Bradshaw v. Bradbury, 64 Mo. 334; Gran v. Spangenberg, 53 Minn. 42, 54 N. W. 933; United Surety Co. v. Summers, 110 Md. 95, 72 Atl. 775. The theory is that a man is more apt to commit an error with his pen in writing a figure than in writing a word, and that the words ought to be deemed the better and more solemn statement, and therefore should govern. It is unnecessary to determine here whether such a rule obtains in this state. If such should be held to be our rule, the check would have to be construed as one for $5 only, and parol evidence would not be admissible to make it otherwise. This would necessarily compel an affirmance of the judgment and order. In passing it may be noted that the legislature, at its last session, enacted certain rules of construction for negotiable instruments, one of which is that, "where the sum payable is expressed in words and also in figures and there is a discrepancy between the two, the sum denoted by the words is the sum payable." Civ. Code, § 3098, subd. 1.

Purely for the purposes of this decision we shall assume that no such rule can be applied here, and that the case is as stated by learned counsel for defendant in the following language: "In the instant case, the written instrument set out in the complaint as constituting the basis of a recovery shows upon its face that there were incorporated therein with equal prominence two different and entirely inconsistent statements, as to the amount of money which appellant was thereby directed to pay."

The result of course would be that we have an instrument which, on its face, is apparently void for uncertainty. Unless the uncertainty could properly be removed by evidence aliunde, the judgment of the trial court cannot be disturbed.

The principal claim of appellant bank is that the trial court erred in refusing to receive parol evidence of the transaction between the plaintiff and the payee named in the check, culminating in the giving of the check, for the purpose of showing the intention of plaintiff to give a check for $500 to the payee. It seems to be the theory of learned counsel for defendant that under various sections of our Civil Code (1635-1637, 1640, 1641, 1643, 1647, 1654), which simply lay down well-settled rules for the construction of the language used in a contract, the ambiguity may be removed and the check treated as one for $500. This theory is without any support in the authorities. Rules provided for the construction of contracts are simply for the purpose of ascertaining the true intent and meaning of the language used therein. Under these rules parol evidence is admissible where it tends to show the correct interpretation of the language used, the purpose being to enable the court or jury to understand, in the light of the circumstances shown, what the words employed really mean, and to interpret those words, in so far as this can reasonably be done, in accord with the intention of the parties as the same may be shown by such circumstances. But no authority sustains the proposition that under the guise of construction or explanation a meaning can be given to the instrument which is not to be found in the instrument itself, but is based entirely upon direct evidence of intention independent of the instrument. It has been well said that in the admission of extrinsic evidence the line which separates evidence which aids the interpretation of what is in the instrument from direct evidence of intention independent of the instrument must be kept steadily in view, the duty of the court being to declare the meaning of what is written in the instrument, and not what was intended to be written. See 17 Cyc. 675. It is well settled that parol evidence is not admissible to explain such a patent ambiguity as we have in this case. It may not be correct to say that a prima facie patent ambiguity can never be explained by evidence aliunde, for it may be that such evidence will sometimes show that the apparent uncertainty in the language used does not in truth exist. But this cannot be true of such an ambiguity as we have here. Whatever parol evidence might be introduced in this case, we would still have the "two different and entirely inconsistent statements," each statement absolutely clear and unambiguous and capable of meaning only one thing. So far as the language of the instrument is concerned, the uncertainty would be just as hopeless as it was without the evidence, and the true intent could not be ascertained from the language of the instrument. No authority to which we have been referred or that we have found sustains the proposition that evidence aliunde is admissible to explain such an ambiguity. All appear to be directly opposed to any such view. See in this connection Browne, Parol Ev. pp. 116-120; 2 Elliott, Contr. §§ 1655-1658; 1 Beach, Contr. § 742. This was recognized in the opinion of Poorman v. Mills, supra, where it was said by this court: "The most that can be claimed for this memorandum, in L.R.A.1918C.

figures, is that its presence on the face of the certificate serves to create a patent ambiguity; but this cannot be helped by averment, or evidence aliunde."

See also Hall v. Bartlett, 158 Cal. 641, 112 Pac. 176; Brandon v. Leddy, 67 Cal. 43, 7 Pac. 33.

In the case at bar the proposed evidence was at best but mere evidence of intention, in no degree assisting in the construction of the language used.

The complaint in this action contained an allegation as follows: "That by inadvertence and mistake of plaintiff herein plaintiff wrote the figures $500.00 on the margin of said check: that said marginal figure was intended to be the sum of $5.00."

This was in addition to the other allegations which, in accord with the view we have expressed, stated a complete cause of action against the bank. This allegation was denied by the answer, wherein the bank also set up the facts it relied on to show that the check should have been for $500. Plaintiff tendered no proof in support of this allegation, and the court made no finding thereon. It is claimed that, in view of the presence of this allegation and the attempted issue made thereon, the proposed evidence was admissible. In view of what we have said, it is clear that the allegation was altogether immaterial in so far as plaintiff's right to recover was concerned. His cause of action was complete without this allegation, which was mere surplusage, and the denial did not make a material issue of fact. Code Civ. Proc. § 590. "The fact that the answer alleged facts which were irrelevant, immaterial, or incompetent as a defense, gave no right to establish them by proof." Braun v. Woollacott, 129 Cal. 113, 61 Pac. 801.

What we have said makes it apparent that § 1856, Code of Civil Procedure, cannot be held to have application here. The case is not one in which "a mistake or imperfection of the writing is put in issue by the pleadings."

We are satisfied that the trial court did not err in excluding the proffered evidence.

Of course defendant is not in a position to complain that the judgment against it is for $5 less than the amount to which, it may be assumed, plaintiff was entitled.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Annotation—Discrepancy between words and figures in the body of a check describing the amount thereof.

According to the authorities, it is a general rule that, where there is a difference between marginal figures and words in a negotiable instrument, evidence cannot be received to explain it, but the words in the body of the paper must control. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 86. That the words in the body of the instrument control where there is a discrepancy between them and marginal figures has been held in case of checks (National Bank v. Second Nat. Bank (1880) 69 Ind. 479, 35 Am. Rep. 236), and drafts (Smith v. Smith (1850) 1 R. L. 398, 53 Am. Dec. 652; Saunderson v. Piper (1839) 5 Bing. N. C. 425, 132 Eng. Reprint, 1163, 7 Scott, 408, 2 Arnold, 58, 7 Dowl. P. C. 632, 3 Jur. 773). Evidence that a draft containing marginal figures of "245" and words in the body thereof, "two hundred pounds," to indicate the amount, was intended as a draft for £245 is not admissible; the instrument will be treated as one for £200. Saunderson v. Piper (Eng.) supra.

The figures in the check involved in PAYNE v. COMMERCIAL NAT. BANK, ante, 328, were not marginal figures, but were written in the body of the check. A different situation is thus presented. The court assumes that the check was void because of the discrepancy between the figures thus written and the words indicating the amount. There is very little authority on the effect of a discrepancy between figures in the body of the check and words to indicate the amount.

In State v. Bank of Western (1892) 34 Neb. 175, 51 N. W. 749, the plaintiff had purchased of a bank a draft intended to be for $500; a draft was issued to him reading "Pay to the order of . . . $500.00, five and no/100 dollars." In the space below the number of the draft, in the upper right-hand corner, was cut through the paper with a perforator or machine usually employed by banks for that purpose, the following, "$500$,"—the dollar mark being placed both before and after the figures; the purchaser paid to the bank the full sum of $500 for the draft; it was intended by all parties to be for the sum of $500, but, by mistake, the word "hundred" was omitted in the words indicating the amount; the check was indorsed by the payee and presented to the drawee bank; payment thereof was refused by the drawee for a larger sum than five dollars, the amount written in the body of the check in words; upon notice being given to the drawer bank, the cashier made affidavit that the draft was intended for $500, and, by mistake, the word "hundred" was omitted from the clause indicating the amount in words; the drawee bank, however, refused to pay more than $5 on the draft; in the meantime the drawer bank had become insolvent, whereupon the purchaser filed his petition in the insolvency proceedings, asking to be allowed the $500. The receiver of the insolvent bank admitted the facts as aforesaid, and the case was submitted on the pleadings. The court, after stating that the draft was clearly intended as one for $500, rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the $500 without any further discussion.

Messrs. John H. Webb, W. B. Rogers, Fred A. Meyers, and T. W. Hoopes, for appellees:

Where the contract sought to be specifically enforced required the making of a different disposition of the property of the deceased person from that which the law prescribes, a court of equity will look with jealousy upon the evidence offered in support of such contract, and will weigh such evidence in the most scrupulous manner.

Cooke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Granville V. E. Fletcher died in Fayette county January 20, 1915, at the age of seventy-two years. He left as his only heirs at law two uncles, Cyrus N. Fletcher, who lived at St. Elmo, in Fayette county, a brother of the father of deceased, who was then seventy-four years of age, and Granville Osborn, who resided in Ohio, a brother of the mother of deceased. Cyrus N. Fletcher and deceased were not on friendly terms, and, according to the testimony of Cyrus, had not spoken to one another for more than ten years prior to the death of deceased. No last will and testament was found among deceased's effects, and Cyrus N. Fletcher was appointed administrator of the estate by the probate court of Fayette county upon his own petition. The existence of Granville Osborn was unknown at that time to Cyrus N. Fletcher, who described himself in the petition as the sole heir of deceased. The deceased died seised of 642 acres of land near St. Elmo and personal property of the value of $6,000 or $7,000. Shortly after his appointment as administrator Cyrus N. Fletcher filed his bill in the circuit court of Fayette county for the partition of said real estate, making Granville Osborn the only defendant, alleging that each was the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the real estate of which Granville V. E. Fletcher died seised. After the filing of the bill Grant Fletcher, the appellant, asked leave to be made a party defendant, and, the same being granted, he filed his answer to the bill, and also filed a cross bill. By his cross bill he alleged that about the year 1877, when he was eleven years of age, his father and mother both being dead, he was taken by the deceased and his mother into their home, where he lived as a member of the family until the death of the mother of deceased; that the deceased was a bachelor, never having married; that he prevailed upon appellant to remain with him and work for him, take care of the land and the crops growing thereon, and assist in every way in the management of the farm, live stock, and personal property; that deceased did not pay appellant any sum of money as wages, but always promised that he would take care of him and give him lands and other property; that in February, 1898, appellant was desirous of having a more definite arrangement as to the compensation for his years of service, and deceased entered into a contract and agreement with him, in and by which appellant agreed to remain with deceased during the remainder of the lifetime of deceased and care for his real estate and look after all his interests in a general way, and deceased agreed and promised appellant that, in consideration of the years of service rendered theretofore by him, and in consideration of appellant's promise to remain with and take care of deceased and his property so long as deceased should live, he would convey and transfer to appellant all the property, real and personal, that he owned at that time or might thereafter acquire, and the benefits, use, and right to sell and convey said lands and personal property should accrue to and vest in appellant at the death of deceased; that, pursuant to said contract, appellant remained with and cared and provided for deceased; that the family consisted of appellant and deceased, and that, from that time until the death of deceased, appellant gave all his time and labor to the management, control, and care of deceased and of his farm and personal property; that for ten years preceding the death of deceased, appellant had the absolute control of all his real and personal property, residing upon the land with deceased, renting certain portions of it, and collecting the rents therefor, employing and discharging men who worked upon the premises, selling the crops grown thereon, and at all times leaving with deceased the proceeds arising therefrom, to be held and enjoyed by him during his lifetime; that during that time deceased did not interfere with appellant's possession of the land or of the personal property, but at all times said that appellant was the owner of all of said land and personal property; that deceased stated to him that he had executed the necessary papers to transfer title to appellant, and that at his death the title, possession, and right to use and dispose of all the property, real and personal, would be found in appellant. The bill then alleges that the deceased repeatedly told his intimate friends that said real and personal property belonged to appellant and that he had no interest therein other than the use thereof during his natural life; that during all these years the deceased paid nothing to appellant except his necessary living expenses, and on one occasion the sum of $1,000; that from time to time he gave appellant certain articles of personal property in pursuance of the contract; that appellant has fully performed his part of the agreement by giving to deceased thirty-eight years of service, and is entitled to the specific performance of the contract so entered into, and to have all the lands of which Granville V. E. Fletcher died seised conveyed to him free and clear from the rights or interests of the other parties to the proceedings. The bill concludes with a prayer for specific performance of the contract, and that the court decree the execution of sufficient deeds of conveyance to appellant of the real estate of which Granville V. E. Fletcher died seised. The defendants in the cross bill answered, the cause was heard by the chancellor, and a decree entered finding that appellant had failed to establish the contract set up in his cross bill by clear, explicit, and satisfactory proof, dismissing the cross bill for want of equity, and granting the prayer of the original bill. This appeal has been perfected from that decree.

The appellant sought to prove the existence of the contract and its terms by declarations made by Granville V. E. Fletcher and by appellant during the lifetime of Granville V. E. Fletcher and by the conduct of the parties to the contract. It is insisted on the part of appellees that proof of this character is insufficient. On numerous occasions we have been called upon to determine the quantum of proof required in cases of this kind and the competency of the evidence offered. The rules applicable are thus stated in Kane v. Hudson, 273 Ill. 350, 112 N. E. 683, together with the authorities there cited in support thereof: "If an oral contract to convey land has been made, and there has been such performance in reliance upon the contract as will take it out of the Statute of Frauds, it will be enforced by a court of equity. Such a contract must be clear and definite and unequivocal in its terms, and it must be clearly and satisfactorily proved. It is indispensable that the acts done in performance of the contract shall be referable to the contract alone, and to have been done in performance of it. It is not necessary that the contract shall be proved by the testimony of any witness who heard it made, and it may be proved by declarations of the parties not in the presence of each other, together with evidence of acts and conduct of the parties which shows that the agreement was made; but it cannot be proved by declarations or acts of only one party to the alleged contract not binding upon the other. Geer v. Goudy, 174 Ill. 514, 51 N. E. 623; Seitman v. Seitman, 204 Ill. 504, 68 N. E. 461; Standard v. Standard, 223 Ill. 255, 79 N. E. 92; Watson v. Watson, 225 Ill. 412, 80 N. E. 332; Daly v. Kohn, 234 Ill. 259, 84 N. E. 901; Dalby v. Maxfield, 244 Ill. 244, 135 Am. St. Rep. 312, 91 N. E. 420; Gladville v. McDole, 247 Ill. 34, 93 N. E. 86; Willis v. Zorger, 258 Ill. 574, 101 N. E. 963; Christensen v. Christensen, 265 Ill. 170, 106 N. E. 627; Lonergan v. Daily, 266 Ill. 189, 107 N. E. 460."

The principal question raised is one of fact, whether the evidence is sufficient to prove clearly and satisfactorily that a contract was entered into, and what its terms were. Twenty witnesses were called to testify on behalf of appellant. These were all persons who lived in St. Elmo or in that vicinity, and who knew Granville V. E. Fletcher well in his lifetime, and some of them were among his most intimate friends. They were all disinterested witnesses, and were engaged in various pursuits. Among them were farmers living in the vicinity of the Fletcher farm, merchants engaged in business in St. Elmo, a physician, a minister, and mechanics. These witnesses testified to conversations had with the deceased during the last twenty-five years of his life. Many of them testified to repeated conversations on the subject of the agreement or contract which the deceased stated he had entered into with appellant. The general effect of this testimony was that Granville V. E. Fletcher stated that he had made an agreement with appellant that, if appellant would remain with him and care for him and take charge of his property and superintend the farm during his lifetime, he should have whatever property the deceased possessed at the time of his death. One witness testified that in 1898 the deceased told him at the farm that he had entered into an agreement with appellant that, if he should stay there and remain single until the deceased should die, he was to get everything that was there. The same witness testified that in the fall before Fletcher died he had a conversation with him at St. Elmo in which he stated that he did not own anything on the farm but the horse he was driving; that appellant owned everything else; and that the deceased further stated that appellant had about filled his part of the contract, and he was satisfied he would stay with him until he died. Another witness, a hardware merchant at St. Elmo and a man who had been intimately acquainted with deceased for more than fifty years, testified that deceased often came into his private office and discussed his affairs with him, and at one time, twenty-five years prior to his death, the deceased told him that, if appellant stayed with him as long as he lived, he had agreed with him that he should have all the property deceased had, both real and personal; that deceased had discussed the same matter with him a number of times since, the last conversation being about a year before his death, at which time he repeated, in substance, the statement he had made on the first occasion. This witness further testified that he was in the habit of visiting frequently at the deceased's home on the farm, and that on one of these occasions he had a conversation with deceased, in the presence and hearing of appellant, in which the deceased said, "That fellow there," pointing to appellant, "owns everything here," and stated further that appellant was to have everything that was there. Two witnesses testified to statements made by the deceased in the office of a police magistrate in St. Elmo about two months before he died, in which he stated that he was going to give all his property to appellant and that he had it all fixed. Another testified that he stopped frequently at the home of deceased, and that on one occasion the deceased told him that he did not own any property; that it all belonged to appellant; and that all he owned was the old horse and buggy. Another testified that fourteen years prior to his death he had worked for the deceased for a year; that on one occasion deceased said, referring to appellant, "There is a fellow, if he stays with me until I am dead and gone, gets everything I have got;" that he stated that appellant was to stay single while he was there, and if he stayed with him and remained single, he was to have everything he owned, and that he intended to make a will to that effect. Another witness, a minister, testified that he heard the deceased state to a sister of appellant shortly before her death, and when she was suffering from her last illness, that she need not worry about her brother's condition in life; that he had fixed everything; and that appellant was to have everything he had. Another witness testified that about fifteen years previously deceased had talked to him about the disposition of his property, and stated that he had arranged with appellant that, if he stayed with him and remained single as long as deceased lived, when he was done with his property appellant should have all of it; that the deceased made the same statement to him, in substance, on several occasions; that the last time he mentioned it to him was about two years prior to his death, on which occasion he said that everything he had was appellant's, and that everything down there (referring to the farm) belonged to appellant. Another witness, a retired farmer, testified that he accompanied the deceased to St. Elmo on one occasion about a year before he died, when he stated to him that he had given everything to appellant, and that he was to have everything he owned if he stayed with him and remained single until he died. Another witness testified that on one occasion when he was attempting to buy some mules from deceased he informed him that he would have to see appellant, as all the property belonged to him. Another witness testified that he had known deceased for ten years, and deceased had boarded at his hotel four or five years prior to his death; that appellant came to see deceased frequently while he was there; and that deceased stated to him that appellant had lived with him from the time he was eleven years old, and he ought to be attentive to him because he was to get everything he had after he was gone. Another witness who owned a farm adjoining that of deceased, and who had known him all his life, testified that about a year before his death he had a conversation with him in which they were discussing appellant and what a good boy he had been to stay with him; that deceased said that appellant had served him there a long time, and he did not do anything at all any more; that he expected some day to give appellant all his property; that at one time he had told appellant he would make him a deed for the land, but they had talked the matter over, and thought it was not the best thing to do, as appellant might die before he did; that deceased said he would fix it anyway so appellant would get it when he was through with it. The witness further testified that he had another conversation with deceased about four years before he died, in which he stated that appellant would have plenty to do him after he died; as he had it fixed so that he would get all his property. Another witness testified that on Thanksgiving Day prior to the death of deceased he asked his permission to hunt quail on his farm, and that deceased told him he would not allow his best friend to do that, but when he was through with it appellant could do as he pleased about it. Another witness testified that at one time he attempted to rent land of deceased, and that he informed him he would not rent his land to anyone as long as he lived, but when he was through appellant could do as he pleased. Another witness testified that during the summer before he died the deceased informed him that he and appellant had a contract that, if appellant stayed with him as long as he lived he was to get everything he had. Another witness who owned an adjoining farm and had known the deceased all his life testified that in 1914 deceased came to him and told him that appellant wanted to see the witness about getting him to put in his part of a division fence; that appellant wanted the fence through, as he desired to use the land for pasture; that the witness told deceased he would not put in the fence, and deceased then asked him to see appellant; that he talked with appellant, and finally agreed with him what part he was to build and what part appellant was to build; that afterward deceased told him whatever arrangement he made with appellant was satisfactory to him; that he was allowing appellant to fix things to suit himself, as then, maybe, it would suit him better after awhile; that he had things already fixed that way, and asked the witness to say nothing about that for the present; that after the fence was fixed the witness asked the deceased to come out and see how he liked what they had done, and deceased remarked, "You know what I told you." Another witness testified that the fall before he died deceased told him that all the property he owned then was a horse and buggy, and that all the other property belonged to appellant; that he did not know how long he was going to live; that he had arranged everything; that he had fixed out the papers to appellant, and appellant was to get everything he had. Another witness testified that deceased told him during the last four or five years of his life that he had turned everything over to Grant; that he did not own anything any more except his horse; that he had fixed everything for Grant, as he had taken care of the deceased, and he meant to take care of him. A physician living at St.

Elmo testified that he had known the deceased and appellant for thirty-three years and was their family physician; that deceased came to his office almost every time he was in St. Elmo, and on numerous occasions had talked with him about his business relations with appellant, and that when the witness asked him what he expected to do with his property when he was done with it, he stated that it was all appellant's; that six months before his death he stated that appellant was to have all he had, that he had been a good boy and stayed with him, and that it was all his. Mrs. Nancy Walker testified that appellant was her nephew, and that about the year 1877, when appellant was eleven years of age, she took him to the home of deceased and had a talk with him about the conditions under which the boy was to be taken into the family; that deceased told her he would treat the boy as he would his own child as long as he stayed with him; that he could attend the common schools, and if he wanted to go he would send him to college; that he would provide for him as if he were his own son, and if he stayed with him and his mother while they lived he would be their sole heir. She testified that the mother of the deceased also made the same promise. This witness frequently visited the Fletcher home, and testified that during the last five years of his life deceased told her he had fixed everything for appellant; that he had an agreement that everything was to be appellant's if he remained with him and remained single. A number of witnesses testified that appellant stated to them during the lifetime of deceased that he had a contract or agreement with deceased that, if he stayed there and took care of deceased during his lifetime, he was to receive everything.

At the time appellant was taken into the family of the deceased he owned a small interest in some property located in St. Elmo. The deceased was appointed guardian of appellant, and acted in that capacity during his minority. The testimony all discloses that during the time from about 1877, when he was taken into the family of deceased, until the death of deceased, appellant remained there constantly, and after he had grown to manhood he assumed the active management and superintendence of the real estate and personal property belonging to deceased. Appellant was a cousin of deceased, being a son of a brother of deceased's father. After the death of the mother of deceased he and appellant lived alone on the farm, doing their own housework and managing the general farmwork. It appears that during all these years appellant faithfully complied with the provisions of the contract.

The defendants in the cross bill, who are appellees here, called a number of witnesses in an attempt to meet the allegations of the cross bill. A number of these witnesses corroborated the contention of appellant that the contract alleged in the cross bill had been entered into between him and deceased, by testifying to statements made by deceased which strongly tended to show the existence of the agreement. Many of appellees' witnesses testified simply to the fact that they had transacted some business with the deceased during the last ten years of his life. This testimony has but a slight bearing upon the issues. It was not contended that under the agreement appellant was to have the present title to and possession of the property, but that he was simply to superintend and manage it. The mere fact that deceased may have transacted some of the business relative to the buying and selling of property, and received the money for property sold, does not tend to contradict the claim of appellant that the contract alleged had been entered into. One witness for appellees testified that in 1910 deceased asked him to come and live with him; that he was getting old and wanted someone to help around the house; that he made the witness the proposition that, if he would come and live with him during the remainder of his lifetime, he would give him one half of what he owned, stating that it would probably amount to about $30,000, but the witness did not accept the proposition. Another witness, one of the attorneys for Cyrus N. Fletcher, testified, over objection to his competency, that on two occasions deceased told him that, if he could leave his property to the Masonic Lodge, it would be about the best thing he could do, and that he did not know but the lodge would be a good party to leave property to. The testimony of these two witnesses was objected to as incompetent. Assuming that it was competent, it was not sufficient to discredit or overthrow the proof made by appellant as to the existence of the contract.

Appellee Cyrus N. Fletcher, his attorney, and another witness all testified that, after Cyrus N. Fletcher had been appointed administrator, he met appellant at the farm of deceased, and appellant told the attorney he had a gun there that deceased had given to him which he would like to have, and that he also had a Bible and his mother's picture in his room, and asked if he could have those; that the attorney then asked him if that was all, and he said, "No; the horses in the barn are mine; that is all I claim." It is contended that this conduct is inconsistent with the claim of appellant that he was the owner of all the property after the death of deceased. Cyrus N. Fletcher was appointed administrator January 27th. On February 24th a stipulation was filed in the probate court whereby it was stipulated between appellant and Cyrus N. Fletcher, who was described as administrator and sole heir at law of Granville V. E. Fletcher, that the administrator should proceed to sell all the property on the farm at public sale; that appellant should not be required to replevin or claim any of the specific property, but that thereafter he should be permitted to make such proof as he could introduce that he was the owner of the property, and that the money arising from the sale was to stand in the place of the property, and he the subject of the litigation just as though claim had been made to the specific property. It does not appear from the record when this stipulation was entered into or the exact date the conversation at the farm occurred between appellant, Cyrus N. Fletcher, and his attorney, but the transactions were contemporaneous, and, conceding that appellant made the statements as testified to by these witnesses (although he denies this), there is nothing in them inconsistent with the position of the parties at that time and their attitude toward one another in the light of this stipulation. Cyrus N. Fletcher also testified that on this occasion appellant informed him that he had no contract, written or verbal, with the deceased in reference to his services there or to what he should receive. This is flatly denied by appellant. In the light of all the proof and all the circumstances shown in the case, the testimony of Cyrus N. Fletcher on this point is too improbable to entitle it to serious consideration.

It appears that some time prior to the hearing on the bill and cross bill appellant filed a claim against the estate of Granville V. E. Fletcher. The record does not disclose the amount of this claim or what it was for. It simply shows that a claim was filed, and it is insisted that this strongly tends to show that no such contract as is alleged was entered into between appellant and deceased. It is true that the filing of a claim against this estate by appellant on any account is inconsistent with his claim that he owned all the property upon the death of deceased. It is not conclusive, however, that no such contract as that alleged had been entered into. Appellant undoubtedly realized that it would be difficult to make the required proof of a contract of this kind, and determined, in the event he failed to prove his contract, to secure some remuneration for the services he had performed. While the filing of the claim tends to disprove appellant's claim that a contract had been entered into, when it is considered together with all the evidence in the case, its effect is so slight as to become insignificant. The great weight of the evidence shows that the contract had been entered into by deceased with appellant as alleged, and that appellant fully performed his part of it.

The evidence is convincing, and establishes beyond a doubt that the deceased promised appellant, if he would live with him, take care of him, and manage his property during his lifetime, appellant should have all his property. The fact that deceased stated on a number of occasions that he had fixed it so appellant would own the property at his death, that he had executed papers to that effect, and that he had executed a will is not inconsistent with the claim of appellant that the contract was entered into. Had the deceased done any of these things, it would have been simply for the purpose of executing the agreement he had entered into. It may be that, in fact, he did execute a will or a deed that may yet be found, whereby he has executed this contract. The court erred in holding that the contract had not been clearly and satisfactorily proven.

The only question remaining is whether the contract as proven was illegal and void as against public policy. It clearly appears that one of the provisions of the contract was that appellant should remain unmarried during the lifetime of Granville V. E. Fletcher. The subject-matter of the contract was not, however, in reference to restraint of marriage. Appellant and deceased did not contract expressly for a restraint upon the marriage of appellant, but they were contracting for the services of appellant in caring for deceased and in superintending the management of his property. The provision that appellant should remain unmarried during this period of service was merely an incident to the main object of the contract. There can be no question that, if these parties had contracted expressly for a restraint upon the marriage of appellant, their contract, under all the authorities, would be void and unenforceable. There is a dearth of authority upon the effect of a contract where the restraint upon the marriage is a mere incident to the main object and purpose of the contract. In King v. King, 63 Ohio St. 363, 52 L.R.A. 157, 81 Am. St. Rep. 635, 59 N. E. 111, a contract was entered into by which one person agreed to live with and take care of another during his life, and further agreed not to marry during such service, in consideration of the agreement of the other that he would provide for her sufficiently to make her comfortable and well off. It was there held that this contract was not necessarily invalid; that, although the promise not to marry is in itself a void promise, as against public policy, yet it was a mere incident to the main engagement, which was for labor and care, and if that service was fully performed, and the recipient failed to perform his engagement during life, the other might maintain an action against his estate on the contract. The holding was also based on the further ground that in such cases the mischiefs likely to ensue to the public by permitting a recovery notwithstanding the void stipulation would be less than those likely to follow a holding which would encourage the violation of contracts and the repudiation of just obligations after full value had been received. To the same effect is Crowder-Jones v. Sullivan, 9 Ont. L. Rep. 27, where a like situation was presented and a like holding had. These two cases are nearly identical in their facts with the case at bar, and in our judgment correctly state the law as applied to such a contract and such facts as are shown here. In Shackelford v. Hall, 19 Ill. 212, it was held that a devise in a will with a condition that the devisee shall not marry until he or she arrives at the age of twenty-one years is lawful, and that a violation of it after notice must be held to have forfeited the estate devised. In arriving at this conclusion we said: "Whoever will take the trouble to examine this branch of the law attentively will find that the testator may impose reasonable and prudent restraints upon the marriage of the objects of his bounty by means of conditions precedent or subsequent, or by limitations, while he may not, with one single exception, impose perpetual celibacy upon the objects of his bounty by means of conditions subsequent or limitations. That exception is in the case of a husband in making bequests or legacies to his own wife. . . . An examination of the subject will show that the courts have very rarely held such condition void, although it might appear harsh, arbitrary, and unreasonable, so as it did not absolutely prohibit the marriage of the party within the period wherein issue of the marriage might be expected."

The contract entered into between appellant and the deceased was not for the express purpose of restraining marriage, nor did it, as an incident, impose perpetual celibacy upon appellant. Under the authorities cited the contract was not void for the reasons urged.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to dismiss the original bill and grant the relief prayed in the cross bill.

Stevens, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal presents for decision the validity of a promissory note in the sum of $5,000, executed by one Theodore Sturges in his lifetime, payable to appellant, H. J. Woods, upon demand. Appellant married the daughter of Theodore Sturges, but the daughter predeceased her father, who, in disposing of his estate, left a valid last will and testament which has been duly probated, and by which he devises and bequeaths his entire estate to his three living children and two grandchildren. His son, R. W. Sturges, and R. M. Bourdeaux, appellees herein, were appointed executors. The executors duly qualified, and as such instituted this suit in the chancery court of Lauderdale county, praying the cancelation and delivery up of the promissory note held by Mr. Woods. The bill charges that the note was executed without consideration, and evidences an unexecuted gift for $5,000. Conceding, for the purpose of this statement, the competency of Mr. Woods as a witness, it appears from the testimony taken before the chancellor that the testator, Theodore Sturges, many years ago, stated to Mr. Woods that he (Sturges) desired to make Woods a gift, but in doing so he preferred not to mention or provide for the gift in his will, and requested Mr. Woods to consult an attorney to determine whether the gift could be made in the form of a promissory note. It appears from Mr. Woods's testimony that he then accepted the note as a gift. The original note was executed about 1909, and in 1915 the testator executed and delivered a renewal note payable upon demand. The renewal note was executed in January, 1915, and in December following Sturges duly executed his will. The will makes no mention of the Woods note or of any gift to Woods. After notice was published to creditors to probate claims, Woods filed his note with the chancery clerk and had the same registered and allowed. There is proof tending to show that after the death of the testator Mr. Woods admitted that his note was without consideration and invalid, and that he promised not to probate it. After its probate the executors exhibited a bill in this case to enjoin appellant from assigning or pledging the note to a third party, and to cancel the same. There is a controversy between the parties as to the competency of appellant as a witness, but the law point determinative of this case renders unnecessary a discussion of any question save the one considered below. The chancellor decreed in favor of the complainants in the court below, and disallowed appellant's claim.

The most that could be said for appellant's case is that Mr. Sturges, the testator, executed a demand note; that this demand note was intended to evidence a mere gratuity; that the note was duly delivered by the maker to the payee, but was not in fact intended to be paid, and was not paid, before the maker's death. Can the note, therefore, be upheld as a gift inter vivos? The authorities answer this question in the negative. In the case note to Sullivan v. Sullivan, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 156, it is stated: "The weight of authority at the present time has L.R.A.1918C.

established as a general rule of law that one cannot make his own promissory note the subject of a gift to such an extent that it can be enforced by the donee against the donor in the latter's lifetime, or against his estate after his death."

This was the conclusion reached by the Kentucky court in the Sullivan Case, there reported, and this conclusion is supported by numerous authorities cited in the footnote. One of the leading cases is Parish v. Stone, 14 Pick. 198, 25 Am. Dec. 378, where the court, by Shaw, Ch. J., very pointedly and accurately says: "It was simply a promise to pay money, and as such, and as a gift of a sum of money, it wants the essential requisite of an actual delivery."

There is a subsequent case note on checks and promissory notes as a subject of gift in 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 308, and in this note the maker's own check is placed in the same category as a promissory note. The authorities are abundantly collated in this note, and are against the contention of appellant in the present case. Counsel have not brought to our attention any decision of our own court where an alleged gift in the form of the maker's own note has been considered. But the spirit and trend of our decisions point to the general rule, and place this court within the spirit of the case just referred to. In Meyer v. Meyer, 106 Miss. 638, 64 So. 420, the general rule that a gift must be completed by actual delivery was announced, and it was expressly held that profits from business credited upon the books to the sons of one of the partners, but not actually paid over before death, could not be claimed as a gift; there being no delivery of the profits. It was there stated that the entry of the credit upon the books kept in the business "constitutes, at most, nothing more than a written evidence of the promise; and the written promise or declaration of an intention to give is no more valid or binding than a verbal one. It is simply easier to prove."

That is the case here. The note relied upon is a written promise by the maker to pay appellant $5,000. The promise was never executed, and indeed was not intended to be complied with, until after the maker's death, although the maturity of the note was on the face thereof stated to be "on demand." The same reasoning is employed in Kingsbury v. Gastrell, 110 Miss. 96, 69 So. 661, where the court uses this expression: "The gift was never consummated by delivery of the notes and the cancelation of the indebtedness."

See also 3 R. C. L. p. 937, § 138, and authorities cited; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1030 and 1063.

The cases relied upon by appellant presented instances where there was a voluntary conveyance of land or other property by the deceased in his lifetime, absolute conveyances, and delivery of property. In the case at bar Mr. Woods lays no claim to any specific property conveyed him, and he is in no wise named in the will as one of the beneficiaries. To enforce now the unexecuted promise of the testator to pay appellant a sum of money would necessarily reduce the estate and take from the devisees that which by solemn will has been expressly devised them.

There is no merit in any of the assignments of error, and the decree complained of is affirmed.

Annotation—Check or note as subject of gift by maker.

It is said in the note in 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 308, that the great weight of authority supports the proposition that one cannot make his own check or promissory note the subject of a gift, so that, in the absence of payment, it can be enforced against the donor or his representative. In addition to the cases cited in the earlier notes supporting this proposition, it is supported by the following more recent decisions: Wisler v. Tomb (1915) 169 Cal. 382, 146 Pac. 876 (the note was delivered to a trustee for the donee, with a written declaration of trust); Walker v. Rockwood (1915) 26 Cal. App. 624, 147 Pac. 992 (note); Abelman v. Haehnel (1914) 57 Ind. App. 15, 103 N. E. 869 (note); Meginnes v. Copeland (1916) — Iowa, —, L.R.A. 1917E, 1060, 160 N. W. 50 (note), overruling, so far as it conflicted therewith, Harman v. Harman (1914) 167 Iowa, 106, 149 N. W. 72; Cox v. Walker (1910) 140 Ky. 172, 140 Am. St. Rep. 367, 130 S. W. 984 (death of the maker of a check given to the payee as a gift, before presentation for payment, revokes the gift); Graf v. Graf (1912) 150 Ky. 226, 150 S. W. 55, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 1138 (note); Meyer v. Meyer (1914) 106 Miss. 638, 64 So. 420 (obiter); WOODS v. STURGES, ante, 338; Nelson v. Diffenderffer (1914) 178 Mo. App. 48, 163 S. W. 271 (recognizing the rule, but holding that in this case there was sufficient evidence of a consideration for the check to support recovery thereon); Provident Inst. for Sav. v. Sisters of the Poor (1917) — N. J. Eq. —, 100 Atl. 894 (a check was given on a savings account, and the pass book was loaned to the donee to enable it to cash the check, but the bank refused payment until it could investigate, and the donor died before the check was paid); Re Wiles (1917) 101 Misc. 701, 168 N. Y. Supp. 940 (note); Bainbridge v. Hoes (1914) 163 App. Div. 870, 149 N. Y. Supp. 20 (holding that a check for substantially all the amount of his deposit, mailed by the maker to his fiancée and received and presented for payment after his death by suicide, did not constitute a valid gift either inter vivos or causa mortis); Bade v. Feay (1908) 63 W. Va. 166, 61 S. E. 348 (note); Blythe v. Atkinson [1916] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 579, 114 L. T. N. S. 1157, 85 L. J. Ch. N. S. 644, 60 Sol. Jo. 539 (donor's note held not the subject of a gift causa mortis); McLellan v. McLellan (1911) 23 Ont. L. Rep. 654, affirmed in (1911) 25 Ont. L. Rep. 214 (a check for less than the amount of a deposit, though accompanied by delivery of the pass book to facilitate payment, if not presented for payment until after the maker's death, will not operate as a gift either inter vivos or causa mortis); Re Bernard (1911) 2 Ont. Week. N. 716, 18 Ont. Week. Rep. 525 (donor's check held not the subject of a gift causa mortis).

Except as otherwise indicated, the attempted gift was regarded in the above cases apparently as one inter vivos. But the rule appears to be the same whether the check or note is intended as a gift inter vivos or causa mortis. Thus, it is said in Meginnes v. Copeland (1916) — Iowa, —, L.R.A. 1917E, 1060, 160 N. W. 50, that practically all the authorities construe a note of the donor made to the donee as a gift merely as a promise to make a gift, and declare that such promise is revoked by the promisor's death, whether the proposed gift is inter vivos or causa mortis.

The reasons for the above doctrine as applied to a check are stated in Provident Inst. for Sav. v. Sisters of the Poor (N. J.) supra, as follows: It is well settled that a gift cannot be effected by the delivery of a check upon an ordinary bank of deposit where the drawer's account is good for the amount. The reason is that until the check is cashed the drawer may stop payment. In such a case the donative purpose may be absolute when the check is given, and ten minutes or ten hours or ten days later, at any time before the check has been cashed, such donative purpose may be wholly changed and abrogated. The fundamental principle of the law of gifts is that the gift, to be effective, must place the thing donated beyond the control of the donor."

If a note is given without any consideration, it cannot be regarded as an executed gift because made payable at a bank. Abelman v. Haehnel (1914) 57 Ind. App. 15, 103 N. E. 869, citing Mader v. Cool (1896) 14 Ind. App. 299, 56 Am. St. Rep. 304, 42 N. E. 945.

Of course, if the check is paid prior to the donor's death, there is a complete gift which cannot afterwards be assailed. This was the situation in Sharpe v. Sharpe (1916) 105 S. C. 459, 90 S. E. 34, where the check was given as a gift causa mortis to a third person, who, prior to the donor's death, cashed it and placed the amount to his own account in the bank, afterwards giving the donee a check for the money, which the bank refused to pay. It was held that there was a sufficient delivery to sustain the gift.

In the note on this question in 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) on page 310, it is said that some cases hold that, if a check intended as a gift is drawn for the full amount of the donor's deposit, it will be regarded as an assignment of the fund. To this effect is First Nat. Bank v. O'Byrne (1913) 177 Ill. App. 473, where a check intended as a gift causa mortis, for a greater amount than the donor had on deposit (the donor, being unable to find her bank book, made the check in such sum as would insure the payee's obtaining the entire deposit), was held to operate as an assignment of the deposit to the donee, and its validity as a gift was sustained. The court was of the opinion, however, in this case, that in any event a check signed by the donor and delivered to the donee should operate as a valid gift, on the ground that it was not a mere promise to pay, as was a promissory note.

A similar conclusion was reached in Aubrey v. O'Byrne (1914) 188 Ill. App. 601, an action apparently by the same donee to recover from the executor of the estate of the donor, money which the donor had deposited in another bank, and which was claimed by the donee as a gift causa mortis under a check executed by the donor and delivered to the donee for an amount exceeding that on deposit. The check was held to constitute a completed gift causa mortis of the amount of the deposit, and to entitle the donee to maintain an action against the executor to recover the same, where the latter wrongfully withdrew it from the bank.

It was held in Maris v. Adams (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 166 S. W. 475, that the donor's note did not constitute a gift inter vivos for the reason that there was no delivery thereof to the payee during the maker's lifetime.

As to the right of one who makes a gift of his note, and is compelled to pay the same to a bona fide holder for value, to recover from the donee the amount so paid, see Dickinson v. Carroll, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 286, and the footnote thereto.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Valley County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on two fire insurance policies. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stout, Rose, & Wells, for appellants:

The policy stipulations relied upon by the defendants were valid and enforceable, and the admitted violation thereof bars a recovery in this case.

Hughes v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 40 Neb. 626, 59 N. W. 112; Home F. Ins. Co. v. Wood, 50 Neb. 381, 69 N. W. 941; Slobodsky v. Phenix Ins. Co. 52 Neb. 395, 72 N. W. 483; Nebraska Mercantile Mut. Ins. Co. v. Sasek, 64 Neb. 17, 89 N. W. 428.

The evidence was insufficient to sustain the plea that the defendants had, by any conduct of their representatives, waived their right to insist that their policies were rendered void by reason of the violation of the stipulations against other insurance.

Hamilton v. Home F. Ins. Co. 42 Neb. 883, 61 N. W. 93; Driscoll v. Modern Brotherhood, 77 Neb. 282, 109 N. W. 158; German Ins. Co. v. Heiduk, 30 Neb. 288, 27 Am. St. Rep. 402, 46 N. W. 481; Schmidt v. Williamsburgh City F. Ins. Co. 95 Neb. 43, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 261, 144 N. W. 1044.

Plaintiff's violation of the policies was not waived by the defendants' failure to formally cancel the same or return a part of the premium before the loss occurred.

Richards, Ins. 3d ed. §§ 141, 143, pp. 176, 177; Farmers Mut. Ins. Co. v. Home F. Ins. Co. 54 Neb. 740, 74 N. W. 1101; Home F. Ins. Co. v. Kuhlman, 58 Neb. 488, 76 Am. St. Rep. 111, 78 N. W. 936; Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 65 Neb. 14, 90 N. W. 1000, 95 N. W. 3; Schmidt v. Williamsburgh City F. Ins. Co. supra.

Mr. E. P. Clements also for appellants.

Messrs. E. J. Babcock and A. Norman for appellee.

Cornish, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant appeals from a judgment in suit on a fire insurance policy.

It appears that without the knowledge or consent of defendant plaintiff violated the forfeiture provision against additional insurance. In the absence of waiver, this rendered the policy void or voidable at the instance of the insurance company. Hughes v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 40 Neb. 626, 59 N. W. 112; Home F. Ins. Co. v. Wood, 50 Neb. 381, 69 N. W. 941; Slobodsky v. Phenix Ins. Co. 52 Neb. 395, 72 N. W. 483; Nebraska Mercantile Mut. Ins. Co. v. Sasek, 64 Neb. 17, 89 N. W. 428.

It is argued that, if the facts of the case do not bring, within the reason and purpose of the rule, the mischief intended to be met by it, the rule does not apply. This is true. It is said that there could be no such thing as overinsurance in this case, because no particular property was insured. Being blanket insurance on horses, cattle, hay, etc., of which the insured might have much or little at the time of the fire, the recovery being limited to actual value regardless of the amount of insurance, it is thought additional insurance could not profit the insured, but rather the insurer because of its right to prorate.

Let us consider this argument. The courts have always held that, regardless of the amount, number, or kind of policies, or even of the insertion of this provision, the contract being one of indemnity only, the total recovery is limited to actual loss. German Ins. Co. v. Heiduk, 30 Neb. 288, 27 Am. St. Rep. 402, 46 N. W. 481; 19 Cyc. 892.

Why is the provision against overinsurance considered material to the risk and enforceable? Is it not because additional insurance increases the moral hazard? The more insurance, the less care to protect and save the property, and, as stated in Hughes v. Insurance Co. of N. A. supra: "It is designed as a check upon the disposition of the evil-minded to overinsure their property and destroy it."

In this case plaintiff was also proceeding against the other company. This increased risk applies to one kind of insurance about the same as to another. The argument proves too much. Why take additional insurance unless with the expectation of either collecting on both policies or relinquishing the first one? If we could assume that the plaintiff and others overinsuring in this case would know that they could not profit by it, either lawfully or by unlawful means, then the argument would be good. This cannot be assumed as a fact. The provision being material to the risk, good faith or mistake in a particular case could make no difference. 19 Cyc. 767.

The fact that some investigation of loss was made by the defendant is not evidence of waiver. At least, this is true when considered in connection with the nonwaiver agreement introduced in evidence by plaintiff. Schmidt v. Williamsburgh City F. Ins. Co. 95 Neb. 43, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 261, 144 N. W. 1044.

The failure of the insurance company to return the consideration of the policy before standing upon its terms does not constitute a waiver. The company does not fail in its promise by insisting on the conditions of its policy; "not having broken its contract, it has a right to retain the consideration." Schmidt v. Williamsburgh City F. Ins. Co. supra, 95 Neb. 51, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 261, 144 N. W. 1044. See also Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Home F. Ins. Co. 54 Neb. 740, 74 N. W. 1101; Home F. Ins. Co. v. Kuhlman, 58 Neb. 488, 76 Am. St. Rep. 111, 78 N. W. 936; Farmers' Mut. Ins.

Co. v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 65 Neb. 14, 90 N. W. 1000, 95 N. W. 3.

The "pro rata clause" in the policy, providing that concurrent insurers of the property shall share the loss, if any, applies only in case the defendant's policies are valid. It applies where the provision against additional insurance has been complied with by making a written indorsement on the policy consenting to such additional insurance, or where the breach of the provision has been waived. It does not constitute a waiver.

An examination of the evidence does not show that the defendant at any time waived the forfeiture provision of the policy. On the contrary, after learning of the forfeiture, it at all times treated the policy as not in force.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

Rose and Sedgwick, JJ., not sitting.

Annotation—Pro rata clause as a waiver of provision against additional insurance.

It will be noticed that the court in MEYERS v. GERMAN F. INS. CO. ante, 341, holds that a pro rata clause providing that concurrent insurers should share the loss applies only in case the policy is valid, and in case the provision against additional insurance has been complied with by making a written indorsement on the policy, or a breach of the provision had been waived, and that it does not constitute a waiver of the provision for forfeiture if additional insurance is taken without the consent of the insurer.

If the only provision in the policy involved in that case was that concurrent insurers of the property should share the loss, it may be reconcilable with some of the cases following; but if, as was probably the case, there were further provisions with reference to the carrying of concurrent insurance, similar to those in the cases mentioned, it is apparently in conflict with them.

Thus, in Bolte v. Equitable Fire Asso. (1909) 23 S. D. 240, 121 N. W. 773, where an insurer without the request of the insured added a rider providing that if, at the time of loss, the whole amount exceeds 75 per cent of the actual cash value, the insurer should not be liable to pay more than its pro rata share of 75 per cent of the actual cash value of the property, it was held that this was a consent to concurrent insurance, and a waiver of a clause providing for a forfeiture if the insured had procured at the time of obtaining the policy, or should thereafter procure, any other insurance; and it was therefore held that a false answer in the application as to the existing insurance on the property was immaterial. The court said: "The principal and legitimate purpose of such a warranty in the application and forfeiture clause in the policy of insurance is to protect the insurer against the hazard of overinsurance, and is regarded as a just and reasonable provision for that purpose; but such conditions, like others working forfeitures, will be strictly construed. . . . Two clauses or methods of accomplishing this purpose are found discussed in the textbooks on insurance and in the decisions of courts: First, a provision may be inserted in the policy for an absolute forfeiture of the insured of all rights under the policy, if other insurance exists on the property and such insurance is not disclosed in the application or assented to by the insurer, or if the insured shall take out additional insurance without the assent of the insurer; second, a provision may be inserted in or added to the policy, limiting the liability of the insurer to a percentage of the value of the property less than its real value, and providing that such reduced valuation of property in case of loss shall be ratably divided between the several insurers, thus limiting the recovery of the insured in case of loss to an amount less than the real value of the property insured. By either method the moral hazard of the insurer is lessened or eliminated. While adapted to the same end, the two methods are wholly different in operation and effect, and it is difficult to see how both can consistently be applied and given full effect in the same contract of insurance. In the case at bar the policy itself contained a provision for absolute forfeiture in case of other insurance not consented to; but the provision requiring assent to additional insurance implies, we think, that the company would be willing to protect itself against overinsurance by adopting the other method indicated above."

And in Sheets v. Iowa State Ins. Co. (1911) 153 Mo. App. 620, 135 S. W. 80, where a rider was attached to a policy, providing that the total insurance should be limited to three fourths of the cash value of the property, and that the insurer should not be liable in case of loss for any greater amount than three fourths of the actual cash value of the property, nor for more than the company's proportion of three fourths of the cash value in case of other insurance thereon, and that if the amount of the policy, together with all other insurance on the property, should exceed three fourths of the cash value, the policy should be void, it was held that the policy was not avoided on the ground of a violation of the provision against other insurance, by the taking of additional insurance, with the knowledge and consent of the insurer's local agent, which did not increase the insurance beyond the limit fixed by the rider.

In Pool v. Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co. (1895) 91 Wis. 530, 51 Am. St. Rep. 919, 65 N. W. 54, the policy contained provisions that it should be void if the insured procured any other insurance, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon, and further provided that the insurer was to be liable for only such proportion of the loss as the amount of the policy should bear to the whole insurance on the property, and that the policy was made and accepted subject to the stipulations and conditions therein, "together with such other provisions, agreements, or conditions" as might be indorsed thereon or added thereto, and that the provisions or conditions of the policy should be waived only by agreement in writing indorsed thereon, and that any privilege or permission affecting the insurance should be written thereon or attached thereto, and it further appeared that there was a written statement bearing even date with the policy and attached thereto, and signed by the insurer's agent, to the effect that, "if at the time of the fire the whole amount of insurance on the property covered by this policy be less than 80 per cent of the actual cash value thereof," then the insurer shall, "in case of loss or damage, be liable for only such proportion of such loss or damage as the amount insured by this policy shall bear to the said 80 per cent of the actual cash value of such property." It was held that, while this provision for prorating did not expressly authorize additional insurance without the insurer's consent, yet it did, by necessary implication, authorize such insurance, and make it an object for the insured to take additional insurance until 80 per cent of the actual cash value of the property should be obtained, and it was held that it should be especially so construed where the defendant's agent had placed, or procured the placing of, the whole of the additional insurance obtained, which did not exceed the prescribed limit, and that, consequently, the risk was not avoided by reason of the obtaining of such additional insurance.

And in Bush v. Missouri Town Mut. Ins. Co. (1900) 85 Mo. App. 155, there was held to be no breach of the provision against other insurance, since permission had been granted to procure insurance to three fourths of the value of the property, where a rider was attached providing that the insurer should not be liable for a greater amount than three fourths of the actual cash value of the property covered by the policy at the time of loss, and in case of other insurance then only for its pro rata proportion of such three-fourths value, and further providing, "Total insurance permitted is hereby limited to three fourths of the actual cash value of the property covered." And a like conclusion was reached in Strauss v. Phenix Ins. Co. (1897) 9 Colo. App. 386, 48 Pac. 822.

And in Palatine Ins. Co. v. Ewing (1899) 34 C. C. A. 236, 92 Fed. 111, where a rider was attached to a policy, providing that the insurer should not be liable for an amount greater than three fourths of the actual cash value of the property covered, and that in case of other insurance only for its pro rata proportion of such three fourths, and further providing, "Total insurance permitted is hereby limited to three fourths of the cash value of the property," and stating that such rider was attached to and formed a part of the policy, it was held that it constituted an agreement permitting insurance already existing at the issuance of the policy, and also additional insurance not in violation of the three-fourths clause, obtained thereafter, and that there was no violation of the provision of the policy for a forfeiture if the insured had at the time of its issuance, or should thereafter procure, other insurance, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed on or added to the policy.

And in Dolan v. Missouri Town Mut. Ins. Co. (1901) 88 Mo. App. 666, there was held to be no violation of a provision against additional insurance where there was a clause in the policy providing that the insured should maintain insurance to the extent of at least 75 per cent of the actual cash value, and that failing to do so the insured should be an insurer to the extent of such deficit, and to that extent should bear his proportion of any loss, this clause being interpreted as a consent that insurance might be taken out to an amount not exceeding three fourths of the value of the property.

But in Cutler v. Royal Ins. Co. (1898) 70 Conn. 566, 41 L.R.A. 159, 40 Atl. 529, a clause stamped on the face of the policy, providing that the insured should maintain insurance on the property to the extent of at least 80 per cent of the actual cash value thereof, and that failing to do so the insured should to that extent be an insurer and bear his proportion of any loss, was held not to supersede a provision that the policy should be void in case of other insurance, at least where the policy itself was for more than 80 per cent of the value of the property.

And in Nestler v. Germania F. Ins. Co. (1904) 91 N. Y. Supp. 29, affirming (1904) 44 Misc. 97, 89 N. Y. Supp. 782, it was held that the 80 per cent average or coinsurance clause of a policy did not constitute a waiver of a forfeiture by reason of other insurance taken without the insurer's permission beyond the 80 per cent limit.

And in Woolford v. Phenix Ins. Co. (1906) 190 Mass. 233, 76 N. E. 722, a policy containing a provision that it should be void if other insurance was taken without the insurer's written consent, and also having attached a provision that the insured should maintain insurance to at least 80 per cent of the value of the property, was held to be avoided where it was assigned to a purchaser of the insured property, who had other insurance on the property to which the company issuing such policy had not consented in writing, and the combined insurance, including the policy of such company, exceeded the value of the property. Birdzell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover $70 and interest on a promissory note made by the defendant to the Sageng Threshing Machine Company, and by it transferred to the plaintiff. The judgment was entered in favor of the defendant upon a verdict of the jury, and the plaintiff appeals.

The defense is that the note was given for stock in a threshing machine company, which turned out to be worthless, and that the plaintiff is not a holder in due course, nor one who has derived title from a holder in due course. The note is as follows:

$100. Hampden, N. D., Sept. 2, 1909.

On or before Sept. 2, 1910, after date, I promise to pay to the order of the Sageng Threshing Machine Company, of Minneapolis, Minn., one hundred . . . dollars.

Value received, with interest at 6 per cent.

[Signed] Albert Benson.

$25 will be pd. Nov. 1, 1909.

$25 " " " Jan. 1, 1910.

On the back of the note is the following indorsement of payment: "April 15, 1910. Pd. $30." The plaintiff received the note in June, 1910. The trial court excluded evidence offered to prove that the plaintiff was a holder in due course, and instructed the jury that, inasmuch as the payments referred to in the marginal notations had not been made in full, the plaintiff was the purchaser of overdue paper, and as such could not be a holder in due course.

The note in suit is what is frequently termed an "on or before note." On its face, in the body of the instrument, the promise is to pay $100 on or before September 2, 1910. There is no ambiguity as to the time of payment, except such as might be thought to arise from marginal notations in the lower left-hand corner of the note. Unless these marginal memoranda amount to unqualified promises to pay instalments at the times designated, they cannot be said to qualify the promise to pay $100, which matures on September 2, 1910. While the court is not free to disregard the plain meaning of a portion of the language appearing upon the face of the instrument in so far as it forms a part of the contract of the parties, it is nevertheless true that where, as here, the body of the instrument speaks in plain terms, and sets forth a contract wholly different in its obligations and legal effect from that which would result were the marginal notations considered as binding, it should not be prone to alter a plain meaning, in order to give effect to words and figures of doubtful legal import. There can be no doubt whatever that it was the intention of the parties to make the note in suit absolutely payable on September 2, 1910; neither can there be any doubt that, under the terms of the note, separate and apart from the memoranda, the maker reserved the right to pay in advance of his legal liability to pay. The marginal notations are such as to convey neither a promise, an agreement, nor a condition in any way changing the legal effect of the words in the body of the instrument, and are in terms which merely express a likelihood that certain amounts will be paid before maturity, giving the dates of such prospective payments. The court is not warranted in giving to the words used a meaning and legal significance entirely contrary to that expressed in the body of the instrument. The language embraced in the marginal memoranda is not sufficiently strong to warrant the bringing of actions for the nonpayment of the sums named, and does not, in our judgment, accelerate the obligation to pay any portion of the note. In these notations, as we view them, it only appears what the expectations of the parties were with reference to advance payments, rather than what the obligation of the maker was to be in that respect.

In determining whether or not an instrument is overdue, for the purpose of fixing the status and rights of the parties thereto, it is proper to inquire whether, under its terms, a cause of action has accrued to the holder. The case of Fisk v. McNeal, 23 Neb. 726, 8 Am. St. Rep. 162, 37 N. W. 616, applies the controlling principle of this decision to notes somewhat similar to that in the instant case. The action in that case was upon two promissory notes, dated July 1, 1878, the bodies of which contained promises to pay ten days after date. Upon one there was a marginal notation as follows: "Due September 30, 1878"—and upon the other, "Due October 30, 1878." The action was commenced on the 18th day of September, 1883, which was within the period of the Statute of Limitations if the accrual of the action was governed by the marginal notations, but which was barred by the statute if the accrual of the action was governed by the maturity as fixed by the language appearing in the bodies of the notes. The court held that the marginal notes or memoranda could not control the body of the notes, and that consequently the action was barred by the Statute of Limitations. The case would clearly be different here, if the marginal notations contained words strong enough to obligate the debtor to pay before September 2, 1910.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to law.

Robinson, J., dissenting:

In this case our judges seem to break even. In the first decision three judges were against the bank and two in its favor. Now, on rehearing, one judge has changed his mind, three judges voting in favor of the bank and two against it. So that makes an even break. However, the result is to reverse the judgment of the district court and the verdict of twelve jurors in favor of the defendant.

As stated in the original opinion, the promissory note in question was given without any consideration, only a promise of some worthless stock, and the plaintiff is not a purchaser in good faith and for value. It took the note after it was dishonored by the nonpayment of $20 which was past due, and it took the note with a good bunch of similar notes, and with knowledge of facts and circumstances sufficient to put it upon inquiry. Bankers are not justified in shutting their eyes and remaining wilfully ignorant when purchasing a note or taking it as collateral security. It is time to put a stop to the gross and prevalent abuse of the rule which gives protection to a real, honest, and prudent purchaser of negotiable paper. The rules should never protect a person taking paper without making any inquiry concerning the consideration and with perfect indifference as to whether or not it was given for any consideration. The rules should no longer be extended to give encouragement to fraud and sharp practice.

The judgment should be affirmed.

Grace, J., concurs in the dissent, but not in all the reasoning thereof.

Annotation—Effect and construction of marginal notations upon a bill or note relating to the time of payment.

This note does not, in general, deal with notations limiting the entire liability, that is, that the note is not to be paid except upon certain conditions. While these in a sense may be regarded as modifying the time stipulated in the note to the extent that it is not to be paid until the stated conditions are fulfilled, yet the entire obligation may be defeated by a failure to fulfil the conditions.

The making of a memorandum on a negotiable instrument as an alteration is discussed in the note to Eaton v. Delay, L.R.A.1916D, 533.

As to circumstances sufficient to put a purchaser of negotiable paper on inquiry, see notes to Mee v. Carlson, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 351, and McPherrin v. Tittle, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 395; and see later cases, Security Trust & Sav. Bank v. Gleich- L.R.A.1918C.

mann, L.R.A.1915F, 1203, and First Nat. Bank v. Stover, L.R.A.1916D, 1280.

As to provision accelerating maturity of a bill or note affecting negotiability, see note to Holladay State Bank v. Hoffman, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 390, and supplementary note to Kennedy v. Broderick, L.R.A.1915B, 472. See also subsequent cases of Finley v. Smith, L.R.A. 1915F, 777, and First Nat. Bank v. Stover, L.R.A.1916D, 1280.

The effect that marginal notations have upon the contract evidenced in the body of a bill or note depends upon the circumstances under which they were placed thereon. Marginal notations placed on an instrument at the time of the execution thereof, with the intention of making them a part of the contract, are held to constitute a part of the contract, and must be construed with the body of the instrument to arrive at the true agreement existing between the parties. While the general question of the admissibility of parol evidence to show when and under what circumstances the notation was placed on the instrument is not within the scope of this discussion, it may be stated that parol evidence has been held competent to show when marginal notations were made. Thus, it has been held, where it appears by the face of the note itself that the memorandum was not embraced in the body of the note, but was written at the bottom, after the attestation of the subscribing witness, that it is competent for either party to prove by parol evidence the time when, the person by whom, and the circumstances under which, the memorandum was affixed to the note. Such evidence, it is held, has no tendency to vary, control, or in any way affect the meaning of the contract. Haywood v. Perrin (1830) 10 Pick. (Mass.) 228, 20 Am. Dec. 518. It may be shown by parol that an indorsement that a note was not to be paid until certain property should be sold by the maker for a fair price was on the note at the time it was signed. Blake v. Coleman (1868) 22 Wis. 415, 99 Am. Dec. 53.

The marginal notation involved in UNION STATE BANK v. BENSON, ante, 345, is treated by the court as a part of the contract. The holding in that case is to the effect that the notation does not so clearly evidence an obligation to pay the sums therein specified at the time stated in the notation as to modify the time of maturity fixed in the body of the writing. A default, therefore, in the payment according to the notation, did not render the paper overdue or deprive one who took thereafter of the rights of a bona fide holder. The question, in other words, was one of construction of the instrument. No case has been found in which an exactly similar instrument was construed. There are a number of cases, however, in which marginal notations modifying the time of payment of the obligation have been before the courts.

Some such notations have been construed as not modifying the contract as evidenced in the body of the instrument.

In Fisk v. McNeal (1888) 23 Neb. 726, 8 Am. St. Rep. 162, 37 N. W. 616, notes containing promises in words in the body thereof to pay ten days after date, upon one of which there was a marginal notation to the effect that it was "due Sept. 30, 1878," and upon the other a marginal notation to the effect that it was "due

Oct. 30, 1878," the marginal notations being placed there by the maker at the time of signing the notes, with the intention of making them payable at the time indicated in the notation, were held to become due ten days after the date thereof, as stated in the body of the notes, so as to start the Statute of Limitations running. In coming to this conclusion the court relies upon the rule that where there is a difference between the words in the body of a negotiable instrument and marginal figures, the words control.

In Way v. Batchelder (1880) 129 Mass. 361, a note dated September 13, and payable in four weeks, contained a memorandum in ink at the bottom thereof, at the left of the signature, as follows: "Due Oct. 12, Oct. 11." The court held that such a memorandum was repugnant and self-contradictory, and for that reason was not to be considered a part of the contract, or sufficient to contradict the terms used in the body of the note, parol evidence as to what the parties meant by the memorandum being inadmissible.

An indorsement on the back of a note, to the effect that "this note is to be extended if desired by makers," is too indefinite to constitute a binding agreement; and the addition of the words, "on payment of the interest as expressed until January 1, 1879," does not make of the indorsement a binding agreement; the addition of such words still leaves the indorsement indefinite, and therefore their addition is not a material alteration of the note. Krouskop v. Shontz (1881) 51 Wis. 204, 37 Am. Rep. 817, 8 N. W. 241.

A marginal notation that a note is "due July 7, 1837," being the date on which the note fell due, without grace, according to the terms in the body of the note, was held not to deprive the makers of days of grace under a statute providing that on all promissory, negotiable notes payable at a future day certain, "in which there is not an express stipulation to the contrary," grace shall be allowed, the marginal notation not being such a stipulation in the opinion of the court. Perkins v. Franklin Bank (1839) 21 Pick. (Mass.) 483; Mechanics Bank v. Merchants Bank (1843) 6 Met. (Mass.) 13.

Other notations have been construed to modify the time fixed in the body of the instrument for the payment thereof.

A draft drawn in the usual form for a sight draft, directing the drawee to "pay to . . . or order $250, and charge to my account," but containing immediately after the word "account" the words "due Oct. 1," was held, in Torpey v. Tebo (1903) 184 Mass. 307, 68 N. E. 223, to be a time draft, due October 1, and as so construed, the order was held an unconditional order to pay a sum certain in money at a fixed future time, and therefore to be a bill of exchange.

A memorandum in the margin of a note due one day after date, that it is "payable in merchantable fulled cloth 1 year from the month of October next," made as a part of the contract evidenced by the note before signing, governs the contract; it is not a contract for the payment of the note one day after date, as stipulated in the body thereof. Fletcher v. Blodgett (1844) 16 Vt. 26, 42 Am. Dec. 457.

A memorandum at the bottom of a demand note to the effect that "it is understood and agreed that the said . . . (principal maker) is not to be compelled to pay said note before April 1st, 1881," made before the delivery of the note to the original payee, is a part of the contract, and by its manifest intention neither the principal maker nor one who appeared as surety on the face of the note is bound to pay the note until April 1st, 1881. Franklin Sav. Inst. v. Reed (1878) 125 Mass. 365.

An indorsement upon the back of a promissory note due according to its terms on January 1, 1872, that one half the amount is to be paid on January 1, 1872, and the remaining half on January 1, 1873, made before the note was signed, to evidence the agreement of the parties, operates to divide the note into two payments, and changes the body of the paper in respect of maturity. Bay v. Shrader (1874) 50 Miss. 326.

A note payable according to the body thereof in nineteen months after May 1, 1899, the date thereof, but containing an indorsement at the foot, below the signatures, that the amount thereof shall be paid in three payments with interest included, viz., "January 1, 1900; July 1, 1900; and January 1, 1901," was held in Black v. Epstein (1902) 93 Mo. App. 459, 67 S. W. 736, to be due according to the indorsement. Accordingly there was held to be no variance between the note when introduced in evidence and a petition which described a note payable in three instalments.

A draft dated January 31, 1878, payable ten days after date, is not rendered non-negotiable by being "accepted payable March 1, 1878." Green v. Raymond Bros. (1879) 9 Neb. 295, 2 N. W. 881. It is stated that the holders of the draft might have refused to receive any other than a general acceptance to pay strictly according to its terms; but, having taken this qualified one, they were bound by its terms and must submit to the legal consequences; that with this sort of acceptance acquiesced in, the draft was in legal effect precisely the same as if it had been drawn originally payable on the 1st of March, 1878, and accepted generally. The draft, being held a negotiable instrument, was further held to be entitled to days of grace. Accordingly, an action brought on the draft March 2, 1878, was held to have been prematurely commenced.

A memorandum to the effect that "one half to be paid in twelve months, the balance in twenty-four months," placed at the bottom of a demand note, following the signature of the maker, after the note was written and signed, but before its delivery, the maker having objected to it as a note payable on demand, constitutes a part of the contract the same as if it had been included in the body of the note or placed over the defendant's signature, and is to be construed accordingly. Heywood v. Perrin (1830) 10 Pick. (Mass.) 228, 20 Am. Dec. 518. Construing the entire contract, the court held that the memorandum limited and controlled the generality of the words "on demand," so that the holder was not entitled to make demand for payment of the note as to the one half until twelve months, and as to the other until twenty-four months, from date.

In Wheelock v. Freeman (1832) 13 Pick. (Mass.) 165, 23 Am. Dec. 674, a bargain was made between the plaintiff and the defendant for the purchase of a parcel of land for which the defendant was to pay a stated price as follows, viz.: one half in stock at the end of one year if the plaintiff should choose then to take the stock, otherwise, the whole in cash at the end of two years; accordingly, two notes, each for one half the purchase price, were prepared by the plaintiff for the defendant to sign, and made payable to the plaintiff on demand, with interest; the notes were both on one piece of paper, and the defendant objected to signing them as not being made according to the agreement; whereupon a memorandum was added at the bottom of the paper, substantially according to the terms of the agreement, and the notes were then signed; before the expiration of two years the plaintiff cut the memorandum from the notes and commenced action upon them and was nonsuited; after the expiration of two years he commenced the action at bar. The court held that the cutting off of the memorandum amounted to a material alteration, as the memorandum was a part of the notes, and denied the plaintiff the right to recover on the notes, as well as on the original promise, because that was merged in the writing.

An indorsement upon a note that it is not to be paid until property of the maker is sold at a fair price, made at the time the note was signed, becomes a part of the agreement and qualifies the note, and no action can be sustained upon the note without showing that the condition has been fulfilled. Blake v. Coleman (1868) 22 Wis. 415, 99 Am. Dec. 53.

A memorandum at the bottom of a demand note, made at the time of signing the same, "This note not to be collected until . . . Treat takes it up himself, or sees about (something like that) as Mr. . . . has paid said Treat for the same," was held to be a part of the original contract, so that the removal thereof rendered the note void in the hands of the party removing it. Johnson v. Heagan (1843) 23 Me. 329.

A note in the form of a duebill, containing an indorsement thereon to the effect that it is not to be paid until a dividend is declared upon a certain named estate, is to be construed as though the note and indorsement constituted one instrument, the same as if the terms of the indorsement had been inserted in the body of the note itself. Accordingly the money was held not to be payable until a dividend was declared. Effinger v. Richards (1858) 35 Miss. 540.

An indorsement on a demand note to the effect that "we agree not to compel payment for the amount of this note, but to receive the same when convenient for the promisors to pay it," signed by the payee, both the note and the indorsement having been signed at the same time and as a part of the same transaction, was held in Barnard v. Cushing (1842) 4 Met. (Mass.) 230, 38 Am. Dec. 362, to constitute a part of the contract between the parties, and the contract, as thus construed, was held to be unenforceable.

A note due in five years from date, containing an indorsement thereon that it might be repaid at the end of three years from date, was construed in Goodnight v. Texas Land & Mortg. Co. (1896) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 34 S. W. 974, as authorizing payment before maturity only upon the lapse of three years from L.R.A.1918C.

the date of the indorsement, and not as authorizing payment at any time after three years from such date, and before maturity, time being held of the essence of the indorsement.

A memorandum at the foot of a note, viz.: "With privilege of paying all or any portion any time before maturity," signed by the makers and made contemporaneously with the note, was held in Bowie v. Hume (1898) 13 App. D. C. 286, to constitute a part of the note and give the makers of the note the privilege of paying the same before its maturity.

A privilege reserved on the face of the note, of "making payment on account until maturity," was held to destroy the negotiability of the note, in Ezell v. Edwards (1885) 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 672.

A note given in January, 1855, due two months after date, but by mistake bearing the date January 1, 1854, was held to be corrected as to the date by a memorandum on the note, made before the note was issued, that it was "due the 4 March, 1855." Fitch v. Jones (1855) 5 El. & Bl. 238, 119 Eng. Reprint, 470, 24 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 293, 1 Jur. N. S. 854, 3 Week. Rep. 507.

An indorsement appearing upon a note, viz.: "The giver of this note, if he desires, may use the principal after due by paying the interest annually," made as a part of the original contract, must be given effect in construing the instrument. Oskaloosa College v. Hickok (1877) 46 Iowa, 237.

A marginal notation may be a mere memorandum, not made as a part of the original contract evidenced by the body of the note. In such a case it has no effect upon the maturity as fixed in the instrument. Thus, a note which, by its terms, was due June 1, 1911, but which contained in the lower left-hand corner in the margin, after a printed word "due," the words and figures in writing, "May 15, 1911," making the sentence read: "Due May 15, 1911," was held in Danforth v. Sternan (1914) 165 Iowa, 323, 145 N. W. 485, to be due June 1, 1911, the only testimony as to how the memorandum came to be made having been given by the payee, and being to the effect that May 15, 1911, was the date when a deed was to be delivered, and had no reference to the due date of the note. Accordingly, one who took the note before June 1st, 1911, was held entitled to show that he was a bona fide holder. A memorandum indorsed on an accommodation note, payable in one year, upon its negotiation by the accommodation payee the day after its date, that "this note runs one year and one day from date," the writing not being intended to constitute any part of the note, but merely a memorandum of the agreement made between the accommodation payee and the purchaser, constituted no part of the note and did not extend the time of payment beyond the days of grace. Tufts v. Shepherd (1860) 49 Me. 312.

A notation at the foot of a note dated June 30, 1894, and payable six months after date, that it is "due Dec. 3d, 1892," was held not to be a part of the note, and therefore of noneffect so far as varying the date given in the note was concerned, in Dark v. Middlebrook (1898) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 45 S. W. 963.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

L. A. KING, Plff. in Err.,

v.

T. N. LANE.

(— Okla. —, 169 Pac. 901.)

Trial — direction on opening statement.

1. Where the plaintiff's petition states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and plaintiff's reply to the defendant's answer is sufficient in law, it is error for the court to peremptorily instruct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant upon the opening statement by counsel for the plaintiff and the pleadings, unless the opening statement contains distinct and unequivocal admissions which would bar recovery.

For other cases, see Trial, II. d, 3, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Usury — payment of usurious debt.

2. Where the lender neither charges nor receives any more than legal interest, the fact that the money is used to pay usurious debts due from the borrower to a third person does not render the loan usurious, though the lender knows at the time of the loan that the money is borrowed for the purpose of paying such usurious debts.

For other cases, see Usury, I. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

ERROR to the Lincoln County Court to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of certain chattels. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Erwin & Erwin, for plaintiff in error:

It was error to sustain defendant's motion for direction of a verdict in his favor upon the pleadings and the opening statement of counsel for the plaintiff, and to direct a verdict accordingly.

Messrs. Burford & Burford for defendant in error.

Pryor, C., filed the following opinion:

This is a replevin action commenced on the 23d day of October, 1913, by L. A. King, plaintiff in error, against T. N. Lane, defendant in error, for the recovery of the possession of certain chattels under and by virtue of a chattel mortgage given to secure the payment of a certain promissory note. The petition sets forth the execution of the note and the default in the payment thereof, and the execution of the mortgage and the breach of the terms of the mortgage by reason of the failure to pay when due the amount secured, and there is a copy of the note and mortgage attached thereto; and asks judgment for the possession of the property included in said mortgage.

The defendant in error interposes as a defense that he does not know the plaintiff, and never had any business transaction with her, was never indebted to her in any sum, and never, with his knowledge, executed any mortgage or note in her favor; that he is unable to read and write, although he can write his name; that he borrowed the amount of money named in the note set out in plaintiff's petition from L. P. King, who, he is informed, is the husband of L. A. King; that all the transactions in regard to said note were with the said L. P. King; and that he did not knowingly execute a note and mortgage to the plaintiff in error, L. A. King. And for a further defense to said action he alleges various transactions wherein the defendant borrowed money from the said L. P. King, and charges that the said L. P. King charged and collected usurious interest on all the prior loans, which amounted to enough, taken together with the amounts credited on the note in question, to pay said note in full; that the said L. P. King fraudulently and wrongfully made said note and mortgage sued upon payable to the said L. A. King without the knowledge and consent of the defendant.

The plaintiff in error in reply alleges that the money advanced to the defendant on the note and mortgage in controversy was advanced by her and out of her own separate fund, and that she knew nothing whatever about prior transactions between the defendant in error and L. P. King, and that she had no knowledge or notice, if such were the fact, that L. P. King had charged the said usurious interest on any loans that he might have made to the defendant, and that at the time of the execution of said note and mortgage the said L. P. King, who was acting as the agent of the plaintiff in error, refused to loan the defendant in error the money or give him an extension of time for the payment of the amounts due, but informed him that he had money to loan belonging to another party that he would loan him, with the proper security, to discharge the indebtedness due the said L. P. King, L.R.A.1918C.

that the defendant agreed to and executed the note and mortgage and examined them before signing them, and that the plaintiff in error is not informed whether or not the defendant in error is able to read and write.

The cause was regularly called for trial, and a jury was selected and impaneled to try the issues joined by the pleadings above referred to. Upon the conclusion of the opening statement by counsel for the plaintiff in error, the defendant in error moved the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict for defendant upon the pleadings and opening statement of counsel. The court thereupon instructed the jury as follows: "Gentlemen of the jury, motion has been made by counsel for defendant for a peremptory instruction to the jury to return a verdict for the defendant upon the pleadings of plaintiff and statement of counsel to the jury, and the court has sustained that motion upon the grounds that the allegations in plaintiff's petition have not been denied as to the usury charge and statement as admitted on the statement of counsel and the pleadings in said cause, and the jury are therefore directed to return a verdict for the defendant,"—to which the plaintiff in error excepted. The jury returned a verdict in accordance with the peremptory instruction of the court, upon which the court rendered judgment for the defendant for costs expended, and the plaintiff in error prosecutes her appeal in this court for reversal.

The only question involved on appeal and necessary for consideration is whether or not the court erred in peremptorily instructing the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant upon the pleadings and opening statement of counsel for the plaintiff in error. There is no contention made here or in the trial court by the defendant that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The sufficiency of the reply of plaintiff to the defendant's answer is challenged by the defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings and opening statement of plaintiff.

The supreme court of this state, in the case of Sullivan v. Williamson, 21 Okla. 844, 98 Pac. 1001, held: "Where the petition states a cause of action, it is error to sustain a motion to dismiss the cause and render judgment against the plaintiff upon the opening statement of his counsel."

And in discussing the proposition the court uses the following language: "The petition stating a good cause of action, it was error for the court below to sustain a motion to dismiss the cause and render judgment against the plaintiff upon the opening statement of his counsel. 'Such a motion will not be granted merely because counsel failed to state in his opening statement facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.' Stewart v. Hamilton, 3 Robt. 672. A dismissal at the opening on the strength of the insufficiency of the statements of counsel for plaintiff is erroneous, as the evidence might, notwithstanding the opening statement, warrant a recovery. Fisher v. Fisher, 5 Wis. 472; Haley v. Western Transit Co. 76 Wis. 344, 45 N. W. 16. Counsel for defendants in error cite no authorities sanctioning a nonsuit upon the opening statement of counsel. None of the Code states, so far as we are aware, have adopted such practice. The almost universal rule is that motions for dismissal or nonsuit must be predicated upon matter apparent in the record. The opening statement of counsel is never part of the record, unless made so by bill of exceptions or some other appropriate proceeding, and it is rare indeed that the opening statement is ever preserved for the purpose of predicated error upon it. In this case it was not preserved, so we have no means of knowing upon what facts the court granted a nonsuit. As the petition states a cause of action, the court below should have permitted the cause to proceed to trial upon the issues joined by the pleadings. Not to do so was error, for which the cause must be reversed, and remanded for a new trial."

The above case meets squarely every contention made by the defendant in error in his answer to the contention of the plaintiff in error that the court erred in peremptorily instructing the jury to return a verdict for the defendant upon the pleadings and opening statement of counsel for plaintiff in error. Certainly it was error for the court to so instruct the jury upon the grounds that the counsel for plaintiff in error, in his opening statement, had failed to deny matters contained in the answer of the defendant in error, as this more properly would be done in reply to the opening statement of the defendant.

In the reply of the plaintiff to the answer of the defendant, replying to that portion of the defendant's answer wherein he charges that, in various transactions between the defendant and L. P. King, L. P. King had charged the defendant usurious interest which is equal to the amount of the notes involved in this action, the plaintiff admits that L. P. King acted as her agent; that the money advanced on said note was out of her separate funds, and that the defendant understood that he was borrowing money other than that belonging to the said L. P. King, and funds belonging to another person; that the transaction was open, fair, and the defendant understood fully the particulars and nature of said transaction; that the plaintiff knew nothing of any prior transaction between the defendant and the said L. P. King; and that she had no interest whatever in the alleged loans made to the defendant by the said L. P. King. While the legal sufficiency of this reply was not raised directly by motion or demurrer by the defendant, it is the contention of the defendant that the motion for judgment on the pleadings and opening statement sufficiently raised this question, and that the defendant is entitled to have this question passed on. This presents the question for determination whether or not, where one has borrowed money from another with which to pay a usurious indebtedness, and executed his note for the payment of the loan, the borrower can set up as a defense against an action on said note that the proceeds thereof were used to pay a usurious indebtedness, when the lender has knowledge that such loan is being made for the purpose of paying the usurious indebtedness.

It is contended by the defendant that knowledge of the plaintiff's agent, L. P. King, that the money borrowed from the plaintiff was used in the settlement of a usurious indebtedness, is to be imputed to the plaintiff. If it is true, as contended by the defendant, that the proceeds of the loan were to be used by the agent to pay himself an unlawful claim, such as would render the plaintiff's loan illegal and the payment unenforceable, and this with the understanding and consent of the defendant, the agent's position is adverse to that of the plaintiff, and such knowledge would not be imputable to the plaintiff. But for the purpose of determination of the question raised, it may be assumed that the plaintiff had knowledge of the application of the proceeds of the loan.

Section 1005, Revised Laws 1910, provides: "The taking, receiving, reserving or charging a rate of interest greater than is allowed by the preceding section shall be deemed a forfeiture of twice the amount of interest which the note, bill or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon. In case a greater rate of interest has been paid, the person by whom it has been paid, or his legal representatives, may recover from the person, firm or corporation taking or receiving same, in an action in the nature of an action of debt, twice the amount of the interest so paid. . . ."

There is no charge by the defendant that the plaintiff has been paid or has taken, received, reserved, or charged any interest greater than allowed by law, or that the note and mortgage involved in this controversy are usurious.

The above section forfeits twice the amount of usurious interest taken, received, reserved, or charged, and, where the party has paid usurious interest, gives him a right of action in the nature of debt against the one to whom it is paid to recover twice the amount so paid. The remedy provided for by the statute is in the nature of a penalty, and it has been held by our court that the remedy is personal, and that the person who has paid the usurious interest may waive the same. The purpose of the law is to penalize the person, firm, or corporation who has charged or received the usurious interest. This court has never passed on the question involved here, but all the courts have held, so far as a diligent search of the law reports discloses that, where a person borrows money for the purpose of paying off a usurious note or indebtedness, he cannot set up the fact that the loan was for the purpose of paying off such usurious indebtedness against the lender, and thereby defeat his recovery, and that notwithstanding the lender had knowledge that the loan was being made to enable the borrower to pay to another person a usurious debt; and there seems to be no holding to the contrary.

"Where the lender of money neither charges nor receives any more than legal interest, the fact that the money is used to pay usurious debts due from the borrower to a third person does not render the loan usurious, though the lender knows at the time of the loan that the money is borrowed for the purpose of paying such usurious debts." 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 512.

This text is fully supported by the following cases: 39 Cyc. 999; Call v. Palmer, 116 U. S. 98, 29 L. ed. 559, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 301; Trimble v. Thorson, 80 Iowa, 246, 45 N. W. 742; Yeiser v. Fulton, 36 Neb. 518, 54 N. W. 824; Thompson v. First State Bank, 99 Ga. 651, 26 S. E. 79; Vaught v. Rider, 83 Va. 659, 5 Am. St. Rep. 305, 3 S. E. 293; Jenkins v. Levis, 25 Kan. 479; Lowe v. Walker, 77 Ark. 103, 91 S. W. 22.

The facts in the foregoing cases are, if not identical with the instant case, so similar that the principles announced in those cases are decisive of this case; especially the facts in the case of Trimble v. Thorson seem to be identical with the facts in this case.

Under the above authorities it seems that the principle of law is well settled that the matter of usury is a question exclusively between the person paying the same and the person charging or receiving the same. If the defendant used the money for the purpose of paying off a usurious debt, this was his own privilege, and it did not concern the plaintiff. And if he paid a usurious indebtedness to L. P. King, his cause of action for the recovery of the same is against L. P. King, and not against the plaintiff.

The defendant relies on the case of First State Bank v. Bridges, 39 Okla. 355, 135 Pac. 378, as an authority in this case. In that case Bridges sued the bank to recover usurious interest paid. The bank admitted the taking and receiving of usurious interest, but denied that it "knowingly and corruptly" received the same, but admitted that its cashier, who consummated the usurious loan and accepted the usurious notes as cashier of the First National Bank, which was later merged with the First State Bank, and who collected the notes for the First State Bank as its cashier, the notes having been assigned to the First State Bank, had knowledge of the usury and the receiving of the same by the bank. Under these facts the court held the bank liable. The facts in this case are entirely different.

It must therefore be held that the reply of the plaintiff to the answer of the defendant states facts sufficient to constitute a defense to the new matters alleged in defendant's answer.

Therefore this cause should be reversed and remanded, with directions to grant a new trial.

Annotation—Loan to pay usurious debt.

It is not usury to advance innocently money to pay off a usurious loan. Yeiser v. Fulton (1893) 36 Neb. 518, 54 N. W. 824; Steen v. Stetch (1897) 50 Neb. 572, 70 N. W. 48. So there is no usury in a new note given to an innocent holder of a usurious note. McFarland v. State Bank (1898) 7 Kan. App. 422, 52 Pac. L.R.A. 1918C.

110; Kent v. Walton (1831) 7 Wend. (N. Y.) 256.

Taking innocently, at the maker's request, an assignment of a usurious debt and a substituted security for it, is not usurious in New York. Houghton v. Payne (1857) 26 Conn. 396.

So taking, at the maker's request, an assignment of a usurious mortgage, is not usurious, the assignee not being shown to have notice of the usury. Perdue v. Brooks (1888) 85 Ala. 459, 5 So. 126. And a general principle that lending money to pay off a usurious debt without notice of the usury is not usurious seems to be recognized in May v. Folsom (1896) 113 Ala. 198, 20 So. 984.

A loan by a third person to pay a usurious debt, which is not a contrivance to evade the usury law, is not usurious. Call v. Palmer (1885) 116 U. S. 98, 29 L. ed. 559, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 301.

It was similarly held in Lanier v. Union Mortg. Bkg. & T. Co. (1897) 64 Ark. 39, 40 S. W. 466; Cottrell v. Southwick (1887) 71 Iowa, 50, 32 N. W. 22; Deatly v. Ralls (1881) 3 Ky. L. Rep. 386; Stephenson v. Shirley (1901) 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1159, 60 S. W. 387; Wilson v. Harvey (1871) 4 Lans. (N. Y.) 507 (obiter).

Thus, where one, at the request of a mortgagor who promised to have a new mortgage executed by himself and wife, paid for and took an assignment of a usurious mortgage, and the wife did not execute the new mortgage, there was no usury as to the husband, but the usury as to the wife was not eliminated. Lowe v. Walker (1905) 77 Ark. 103, 91 S. W. 22.

Other cases clearly dispose of the matter of notice, and hold that, where the lender of money neither charges nor receives any more than the legal rate of interest, the fact that the money was, with his knowledge, borrowed for the purpose of paying a debt infected with usury, due from the borrower to a third person, does not make the loan usurious.

Thompson v. First State Bank (1896) 99 Ga. 651, 26 S. E. 79; Carter v. Brooks (1916) 144 Ga. 852, 88 S. E. 209; Pence v. Christman (1860) 15 Ind. 257; Switz v. Platts (1863) 15 Iowa, 298; Wendlebone v. Parks (1865) 18 Iowa, 547 (where the old securities were transferred to the new creditor); Mason v. Searles (1881) 56 Iowa, 532, 9 N. W. 370; Trimble v. Thorson (1890) 80 Iowa, 246, 45 N. W. 742; Brown v. Cass County Bank (1892) 86 Iowa, 527, 53 N. W. 410; France v. Smith (1893) 87 Iowa, 552, 54 N. W. 366; Jenkins v. Lewis (1881) 25 Kan. 479; Ratliffe v. Buckler (1901) 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1790, 61 S. W. 472; Gathereole v. Young (1881) 61 N. H. 121; KING v. LANE, ante, 351, Vaught v. Rider (1887) 83 Va. 659, 5 Am. St. Rep. 305, 3 S. E. 293, reversed on another ground.

Thus, in Bearce v. Barstow (1812) 9 Mass. 48, 6 Am. Dec. 25, A, being indebted to B on a usurious contract, sold land to C, who agreed for part of the price to become answerable to B for A's debt, and gave a note to B therefor, and B discharged A. It was held that C's note was not usurious.

The payment of a third person's debt, if ratified, constitutes a good claim, though the payor knew the debt included usurious charges. Mills v. Johnston (1859) 23 Tex. 328.

It may be noted that, where a surety on usurious paper receives the amount from the maker and gives a new note to the creditor for the amount, the new note is not usurious. Scott v. Lewis (1816) 2 Conn. 132; Botsford v. Sanford (1817) 2 Conn. 276. B. B. B.

States Supreme Court in BATES v. BODIE. It will be observed that the decision of the latter court is upon the ground that the judgment of the Arkansas court was res judicata and an estoppel, the question of alimony having been presented to that court. In this respect the case is distinguishable from many of the cases cited in the notes referred to.

ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Nebraska to review a judgment which, on second appeal, affirmed a judgment of the District Court for York County in favor of plaintiff in a suit by her for additional alimony. Reversed.

Statement by Mr. Justice McKenna:

Plaintiff in error, Bates, filed a complaint in divorce against defendant in error in the chancery court of Benton county, state of Arkansas, alleging cruelty and praying for an absolute divorce.

Defendant in error filed an answer denying the charge against her and a cross complaint accusing him of cruelty.

In the cross complaint she alleged that Bates was the owner of real and personal property of the fair value of $75,000, consisting of 320 acres of land in York county, Nebraska, which she described, and alleged further that she was the owner in her own right of $3,000, $2,500 of which she loaned to Bates, taking his note therefor, bearing interest at 8 per cent per annum.

She prayed for an absolute divorce, for the restoration of the money borrowed from her, and "that the court award her such alimony as the facts and law warrant, and all other proper and necessary relief." The court, after hearing, dismissed Bates's complaint for want of equity and granted her a divorce; and alimony was decreed her as follows:

"It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the defendant Lucie Bates have and recover of and from the defendant [plaintiff] Edward Bates the sum of $5,111 in full of alimony and all other demands set forth in cross bill which judgment is rendered by the consent of the plaintiff on condition that no appeal be taken by the defendant from the judgment and decree herein rendered."

Certain personal property, consisting of silverware and household furniture, was adjudged to her and a lien was declared on a lot in the city of Siloam Springs, state of Arkansas, and certain notes and mortgages amounting to the sum of $2,801.06 were required to be deposited with the clerk of the court as additional security. He, however, was given the power to sell the same, but required to deposit the proceeds of the sale with the clerk until the sum awarded her be paid, for which no execution was to issue for six months. It was also decreed "that she be restored to her maiden name . . . and that the bonds of matrimony entered into" between her and Bates "be dissolved, set aside, and held for naught."

She subsequently brought this suit against him in a Nebraska state court, repeating the charges of cruelty against him and the proceedings in Arkansas resulting in a decree for divorce and alimony, as stated above, and "that the court of chancery did not have any jurisdiction of or over the property of complainant which was situated outside of the state of Arkansas, and that, in consequence of that fact, in determining the amount of alimony to be granted the defendant in that suit, he was limited and prohibited from taking into account the above-mentioned property situated in York county, Nebraska. Said court was limited by the laws of Arkansas from taking into consideration said property lying in York county, Nebraska, in determining the amount of alimony that should be granted to defendant in that suit, who is plaintiff herein."

The laws of the state of Arkansas further provided, she alleged, that "where the divorce is granted to the wife each party is restored to all property not disposed of at the commencement of the action, which either party obtains from or through the other during the marriage, and in consideration or by reason thereof; and the wife so granted a divorce from her husband shall be entitled to one third of all lands of which her husband is seised of an estate of inheritance, at any time during the marriage, for her life, unless the same shall have been released by her in legal form."

She further alleged that the land in Nebraska was worth the sum of $48,000, that the amount of alimony allowed her by the Arkansas decree was largely inadequate for her support and was not such a fair proportion of the property of Bates, owned by him at the date of the decree, as she then was and is entitled to in view of the circumstances. She prayed that a reasonable sum be adjudged her out of the York county property in addition to the amount allowed her by the Arkansas decree. A copy of the decree was attached to the complaint.

Bates demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and, she declining to plead further, the cause was dismissed for want of equity. The judgment was reversed by the supreme court.

On the return of the case to the trial court Bates answered. He set up the proceedings in Arkansas and pleaded the decree, and alleged that it was made upon full consideration of the evidence and the issues, and that the court took into consideration the value of the land in York county, Nebraska, in determining the amount of alimony to be awarded to plaintiff. That the decree remained "in full force and effect, except that the amount of alimony awarded therein has been fully paid" by him. That the Arkansas court in awarding the alimony "took into consideration all of the property owned by" him, "which decree, so far as it relates to alimony, having been fully satisfied, has become a full and complete bar to further proceedings on the part of the plaintiff in this suit, defendant in that, to recover additional alimony under the laws of Arkansas." And that, further, under the Constitution of the United States, the findings and decree are entitled to full faith and credit in the courts of Nebraska, and constitute a full and complete bar to plaintiff's right to recover additional alimony under the laws of the state of Nebraska.

It was adjudged and decreed that plaintiff (defendant in error here) have and recover from the defendant (plaintiff in error here) the "the sum of $10,000, being the amount found due her as alimony." The judgment was affirmed by the supreme court, to review which this writ of error was prosecuted.

Messrs. A. C. Rickets, A. W. Field, and W. L. Kirkpatrick, for plaintiff in error:

Although Bates answered on remand and tried the case on its merits, he did not waive the error of the supreme court of Nebraska in holding that Bodie's amended petition stated a good cause of action (1) because the demurrer went to the jurisdiction and authority of the Nebraska court to entertain the suit, and (2) because a good cause of action in the complaint is necessary to recovery.

Mr. Samuel P. Davidson, for defendant in error:

The holding of the supreme court of Nebraska, that the court of chancery of Arkansas was without jurisdiction to take the Nebraska lands into consideration in fixing the allotment to this defendant in error, certainly gave the judgment of the court of chancery the same faith and credit it had by law and usage in the courts of Arkansas. Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court:

A motion is made to dismiss on the ground, as contended, that the decision of the supreme court of Nebraska was based upon a construction of the statutes of Arkansas, and concluded therefrom that the district court of Arkansas "had no jurisdiction to take the Nebraska lands of this plaintiff in error into consideration in fixing the amount of allowance to this defendant in error, and as a matter of fact did not do so." That this conclusion was reached "by reason of the peculiar statute of Arkansas which governs and controls the courts of that state in fixing the allowance of alimony to a wife, in all cases in which the divorce is granted on her petition" (italics counsel's), and the court "was limited and controlled by that statute." It is hence contended that the full faith and credit which the Constitution of the United States requires to be given to the judicial proceedings of another state was not denied to the Arkansas decree, but that the supreme court of Nebraska, considering the statutes of Arkansas, gave to the decree the value those statutes gave to it.

But this is the question in controversy. The decision of the supreme court of Nebraska is challenged for not according to the decree the credit it is entitled to, and it is no answer to the challenge to say that the supreme court committed no error in responding to it, and that therefore there is no Federal question for review. Andrews v. Andrews, 188 U. S. 14, 47 L. ed. 366, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 237. The motion to dismiss is denied.

The decision of the supreme court, affirming the subsequent judgment of the district court on the merits, was by a divided court and the opinion and dissenting opinion were well reasoned and elaborate. The ultimate propositions decided were that the courts of Nebraska would entertain a suit for alimony out of real estate situated in that state after a decree for absolute divorce in another state, the latter state having no jurisdiction of the land, notwithstanding the decree awarding alimony, the decree not appearing to have been rendered by consent, or not having taken such land into account; and that, besides, the Arkansas court had no jurisdiction to render a money judgment for alimony.

The propositions were supported and opposed by able discussion, some of which was occupied in reconciling a conflict of decision in Nebraska, a later decision made to L.R.A.1918C.

give way to an earlier one. We are not called upon to trace or consider the reasoning of the opinion further than to determine the correctness of its elements, and this determination can be made by reference to the divorce proceedings in Arkansas and the decree of the court rendered therein.

The case is not in broad compass and depends upon the application of the quite familiar principle that determines the estoppel of judgments, and the principle would seem to have special application to a judgment for divorce and alimony. They are usually concomitants in the same suit,—some cases say must be,—or, rather, that as alimony is an incident of divorce, it must be awarded by the same decree that grants the separation. And it is the practice to unite them, as alimony necessarily depends upon a variety of circumstances more adequately determined in the suit for divorce; not only the right to it, but the measure of it,—all circumstances upon which it depends then naturally brought under the view and judgment of the court. Whether, however, the right to it should be litigated in the suit for divorce, or may be sought subsequently in another, the principle is applicable that what is once adjudged cannot be tried again. And this court has established a test of the thing adjudged and the extent of its estoppel. It is: If the second action is upon the same claim or demand as that in which the judgment pleaded was rendered, the judgment is an absolute bar not only of what was decided, but of what might have been decided. If the second action was upon a different claim or demand, then the judgment is an estoppel "only as to those matters in issue or points controverted, upon the determination of which the finding or verdict was rendered." Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 351, 353, 24 L. ed. 195, 198; Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. v. Kirven, 215 U. S. 252, 54 L. ed. 179, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 78; Troxell v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 227 U. S. 434, 57 L. ed. 586, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 274; Radford v. Myers, 231 U. S. 725, 58 L. ed. 454, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 249; Hart Steel Co. v. Railroad Supply Co. 244 U. S. 294, 61 L. ed. 1148, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 506.

But how find the matters in issue or the points controverted upon the determination of which the judgment was rendered? The obvious answer would seem to be that for the issues we must go to the pleadings; for the response to them and their determination, to the judgment; and each may furnish a definition of the other. National Foundry & Pipe Works v. Oconto Water Supply Co. 183 U. S. 216, 234, 46 L. ed. 157, 169, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111. If there be generality and uncertainty, to what extent there may be specification and limitation by evidence aliunde there is some conflict in the cases. But we are not called upon to review or reconcile them. Our rule is that an estoppel by judgment is "not only as to every matter which was offered and received to sustain or defeat the claim or demand, but as to any other admissible matter which might have been offered for that purpose." Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 352, 24 L. ed. 197. Is the rule applicable to the instant case?

We have set forth the proceedings in divorce in which, we have seen, there were charges of cruelty, and counter charges. There was display of property, prayers for divorce, and a prayer in addition, on the part of defendant in error, that her husband, Bates, be required to restore a sum borrowed from her, "and that the court award her such alimony as the facts and law warrant, and all other proper and necessary relief."

Responding to the issues thus made and the relief thus prayed, the court adjudged plaintiff in error guilty of cruelty, granted defendant in error a divorce, and awarded her the sum of $5,111 in full of alimony and all other items set forth in the cross bill."

There were then presented the issues of divorce and alimony; the first was made absolute, the second in a specified sum "in full," and the sum adjudged to her was made a lien on his property in the state (Arkansas). We may remark that she was awarded other property. It would seem, therefore, that there is no uncertainty upon the face of the record, and that it is clear as to the issues submitted and clear as to the decision upon them.

But it is answered that—(1) the court had no jurisdiction of the Nebraska lands, and (2) that, besides, it did not take them into account in its judgment.

(1) Counsel make too much of this point. It may be that the Arkansas court had no jurisdiction of the Nebraska lands so as to deal with them specifically, but it had jurisdiction over plaintiff in error, to require him to perform any order it might make. But even this power need not be urged. The court had jurisdiction of the controversy between the parties and all that pertained to it,—jurisdiction to determine the extent of the property resources of plaintiff in error and what part of them should be awarded to defendant in error. It was not limited to any particular sum if it had jurisdiction to render a money judgment at all.

But such jurisdiction does not exist, the supreme court of Nebraska decides and counsel urges. The argument to sustain L.R.A.1918C.

this is that the Arkansas statute<sup>1</sup> (Kirby's Dig. § 2684) provides that when a divorce is granted to the wife, the only power the court possesses is to restore to the parties respectively the property one may have obtained from the other during the marriage, and adjudge to the wife one third of her husband's personal property absolutely and one third of all the lands whereof he was seised of an estate of inheritance at any time during the marriage for her life, unless she shall have relinquished the same in legal form. In other words, against a guilty husband the courts of Arkansas were without power to render a money judgment for alimony, but were confined to an allotment of his personal property and real estate in the proportions stated. But the court was confronted with the question of the relation of that section to § 2681 of the Digest, which provides that "when a decree shall be entered, the court shall make such order touching the alimony of the wife and the care of the children, if there be any, as from the circumstances of the parties and the nature of the case shall be reasonable." In answer to the question, the court decided that the latter section is applicable only when a divorce is granted for the fault of the wife.

Plaintiff in error contests the conclusion and strong argument may be made against it to show that the sections are reconcilable and each applicable to particular conditions. And such was the view of the dissenting members of the court. However, we are not called upon for a definitive decision, on account of the view we entertain of proposition 2, and the reason which, we think, induced the court to render a money judgment.

(2) This proposition is based on the record, which, the supreme court said, "shows that the court [Arkansas court] did not in fact make any allowance on account of the Nebraska lands," and resort is had to parol testimony for the purpose of limiting the decree. But we cannot give the testimony such strength. It is conflicting. It consists of the impressions of opposing counsel and of the parties of the opinion of the court, orally delivered in direction for the decree.

<sup>1</sup> "And where the divorce is granted to the wife, the court shall make an order that each party be restored to all property not disposed of at the commencement of the action which either party obtained from or through the other during the marriage and in consideration or by reason thereof: and the wife so granted a divorce against the husband shall be entitled to one third of the husband's personal property absolutely, and one third of all the lands whereof her husband was seised of an estate of inheritance at any time during the marriage for her life, unless the same shall have been relinquished by her in legal form." Kirby's Dig. § 2684.

The Bodie version is supported by the clerk of the court, whose recollection was that the court did not take into consideration "the land outside of Benton county." But he further testified that there was testimony of the rental value of the Nebraska lands, and that "the chancellor announced that while he did not have jurisdiction over the lands in Nebraska, he did have jurisdiction over the person of Bates, as he was personally present in court. The court required Bates to deposit security for payment of the alimony awarded. . . . As I recollect it, the decree rendered was on the consent of Bates on condition that Bodie would not appeal."

On the Bates side is the evidence of the chancellor, whose opinion was the subject of the testimony of the others. He was specific and direct, and the following, in summary, is his testimony: Depositions were introduced showing the value of and rental income from the Nebraska lands, which were supposed to be in the name of Bates's children or in his name as trustee for his children. The decree for alimony was a lump sum of $5,111 "in lieu of any interest that she might have or claim she might have for any sum." (It does not appear from what this is a quotation—probably from the witness's opinion.) He, the witness, intimated what he would do in the way of a property finding, and the parties agreed upon a lump sum as a final settlement, from which no appeal was to be taken. His view was that the court had jurisdiction of the parties, and held it had not of the land in Nebraska, but it did have jurisdiction to consider its value in determining the amount of alimony. Knowing, as he testified, the law, he did not think he stated that there was no law justifying the court to take into consideration the Nebraska lands. It was not the first time the proposition had been raised before him.

He remembered that Bodie claimed $2,500 as borrowed money, but the money had merged in Bates's estate. He did not understand that it entered in the decree. It was a lump-sum agreement, provided cash could be got to end the controversy both as to divorce and as to property rights. Counsel adjusted it on the outside, for he was quite sure that it was not the amount the court indicated it would allow. The court understood that counsel on both sides agreed to the amount; that the judgment was a complete and amicable settlement between the parties of all property rights involved.

ment was a complete and amicable settlement between the parties of all property rights involved.

We must ascribe to the representation of the decree the same judicial impartiality that induced its rendition, and the representation was circumstantial, without material qualification, doubt, or hesitation. It accords, besides, with the issues in the case and the decree. As we have seen, the amount it awarded was "in full of alimony and all other demands set forth in the cross bill." It also recited that it was "rendered by consent of plaintiff, on condition that no appeal be taken by defendant from the judgment and decree." The amount was secured as the chancellor declared he would secure it; it was paid as it was required to be paid.

The evidence, therefore, confirms the face of the decree and that it was rendered by consent of the parties. It is admitted that consent would give jurisdiction to the court to render a money judgment for alimony.

We think, therefore, that due faith and credit required by the Constitution of the United States was not given to the decree.

The judgment of the Supreme Court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings, not inconsistent with this opinion.

(245 U. S. 366, 62 L. ed. —, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 159.)

Army — compulsory military duty —
Selective Draft Act.

1. The power to exact enforced military duty at home or abroad by citizens of the United States was conferred upon Congress by the provisions of U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8, empowering Congress to declare war and to raise and support armies, and authorizing it to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers expressly given to Congress.

For other cases, see Army and Navy, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — congressional authority — militia.

2. Congressional authority under U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8, to raise armies, is not narrowed by the further provisions of that section concerning the militia, the army and militia powers being different, and operating in distinct and separate fields.

For other cases, see Army and Navy, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Constitutional law — privileges and immunities — due process of law.

3. The national scope of the government under the Federal Constitution was completely broadened by U. S. Const. 14th Amend., by causing citizenship of the United States to be paramount and dominant, instead of being subordinate and derivative, the Amendment operating upon all the powers conferred by the Constitution.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, II. a, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — delegation of power — Selective Draft Law.

4. The administrative features of the selective draft provisions of the Act of May 18, 1917, do not render the act void as a delegation of Federal power to state officials.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, I. d, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — encroachment on judicial power — Selective Draft Act.

5. The selective draft provisions of the Act of May 18, 1917, are not void as vesting legislative discretion or judicial powers in administrative officers.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, I. e, 2, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — religious freedom — Selective Draft Act.

6. The exemptions from military service in the strict sense made by the selective draft provisions of the Act of May 18, 1917, in favor of the members of religious sects as enumerated, whose tenets exclude the moral right to engage in war, does not violate the prohibition of U. S. Const. 1st Amend., against the establishment of a religion or an interference with the free exercise thereof.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, II. d, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — involuntary servitude — Selective Draft Act.

7. The exaction by Congress of enforced military duty from citizens of the United States, as is done by the Act of May 18, 1917, does not render that statute repugnant to U. S. Const. 13th Amend., as imposing involuntary servitude.

For other cases, see Involuntary Servitude, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Zakonaite v. Wolf, 226 U. S. 272, 57 L. ed. 218, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 31.

Mr. Chief Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

We are here concerned with some of the provisions of the Act of May 18, 1917 (Public No. 12, 65th Congress, chap. —, — Stat. at L. —), entitled, "An Act to Authorize the President to Increase Temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States." The law, as its opening sentence declares, was intended to supply temporarily the increased military force which was required by the existing emergency, the war then and now flagrant. The clauses we must pass upon and those which will throw light on their significance are briefly summarized.

The act proposed to raise a national army, first, by increasing the regular force to its maximum strength and there maintaining it; second, by incorporating into such army the members of the National Guard and National Guard Reserve already in the service of the United States (Act of Congress of June 3, 1916, chap. 134, 39 Stat. at L. 211), and maintaining their organizations to their full strength; third, by giving the President power, in his discretion, to organize by volunteer enlistment four divisions of infantry; fourth, by subjecting all male citizens between the ages of twenty-one and thirty to duty in the national army for the period of the existing emergency after the proclamation of the President announcing the necessity for their service; and fifth, by providing for selecting from the body so called, on the further proclamation of the President, 500,000 enlisted men, and a second body of the same number should the President, in his discretion, deem it necessary. To carry out its purposes the act made it the duty of those liable to the call to present themselves for registration on the proclamation of the President so as to subject themselves to the terms of the act, and provided full Federal means for carrying out the selective draft. It gave the President, in his discretion, power to create local boards to consider claims for exemption for physical disability or otherwise made by those called. The act exempted from subjection to the draft designated United States and state officials as well as those already in the military or naval service of the United States, regular or duly ordained ministers of religion and theological students under the conditions provided for, and while relieving from military service in the strict sense the members of religious sects as enumerated whose tenets excluded the moral right to engage in war, nevertheless subjected such persons to the performance of service of a noncombatant character, to be defined by the President.

The proclamation of the President calling the persons designated within the ages described in the statute was made, and the plaintiffs in error, who were in the class, and, under the statute, were obliged to present themselves for registration and subject themselves to the law, failed to do so, and were prosecuted under the statute for the penalties for which it provided. They all defended by denying that there had been conferred by the Constitution upon Congress the power to compel military service by a selective draft, and if such power had been given by the Constitution to Congress, the terms of the particular act, for various reasons, caused it to be beyond the power and repugnant to the Constitution. The cases are here for review because of the constitutional questions thus raised, convictions having resulted from instructions of the courts that the legal defenses were without merit and that the statute was constitutional.

The possession of authority to enact the statute must be found in the clauses of the Constitution giving Congress power "to declare war: . . . to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years: . . . to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." Article 1, § 8. And of course the powers conferred by these provisions, like all other powers given, carry with them, as provided by the Constitution, the authority "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers." Article 1, § 8.

As the mind cannot conceive an army without the men to compose it, on the face of the Constitution the objection that it does not give power to provide for such men would seem to be too frivolous for further notice. It is said, however, that since under the Constitution as originally framed state citizenship was primary and United States citizenship but derivative and dependent thereon, therefore the power conferred upon Congress to raise armies was only coterminous with United States citizenship, and could not be exerted so as to cause that citizenship to lose its dependent character and dominate state citizenship. But the proposition simply denies to Congress the power to raise armies which the Constitution gives. That power, by the very terms of the Constitution, being delegated, is supreme. Article 6. In truth, the contention simply assails the wisdom of the framers of the Constitution in conferring authority on Congress, and in not retaining it, as it was under the Confederation, in the several states. Further, it is said, the right to provide is not denied by calling for volunteer enlistments, but it does not and cannot include the power to exact enforced military duty by the citizen. This, however, but challenges the existence of all power, for a governmental power which has no sanction to it and which therefore can only be exercised provided the citizen consents to its exertion is in no substantial sense a power. It is argued, however, that although this is abstractly true, it is not concretely so because, as compelled military service is repugnant to a free government and in conflict with all the great guaranties of the Constitution as to individual liberty, it must be assumed that the authority to raise armies was intended to be limited to the right to call an army into existence counting alone upon the willingness of the citizen to do his duty in time of public need; that is, in time of war. But the premise of this proposition is so devoid of foundation that it leaves not even a shadow of ground upon which to base the conclusion. Let us see if this is not at once demonstrable. It may not be doubted that the very conception of a just government and its duty to the citizen includes the reciprocal obligation of the citizen to render military service in case of need and the right to compel it. Vattel, Law of Nations, bk. 3, chaps. 1 and 2. To do more than state the proposition is absolutely unnecessary in view of the practical illustration afforded by the almost universal legislation to that effect now in force.<sup>1</sup> In England it is certain that before the Norman Conquest the duty of the great militant body of the citizens was recognized and enforceable. Bl. Com. bk. 1, chap. 13. It is unnecessary to follow the long controversy between Crown and Parliament as to the branch of the government in which the power resided, since there never was any doubt that it somewhere resided. So, also, it is wholly unnecessary to explore the situation for the purpose of fixing the sources whence, in England, it came to be understood that the citizen or the force organized from the militia, as such, could not, without their consent, be compelled to render service in a foreign country, since there is no room to contend that such principle ever rested upon any challenge of the right of Parliament to impose compulsory duty upon the citizen to perform military duty wherever the public exigency exacted, whether at home or abroad. This is exemplified by the present English Service Act.<sup>2</sup>

In the Colonies before the separation from England there cannot be the slightest doubt that the right to enforce military service was unquestioned and that practical effect was given to the power in many cases. Indeed, the brief of the government contains a list of Colonial acts manifesting the power and its enforcement in more than two hundred cases. And this exact situation existed also after the separation. Under the Articles of Confederation, it is true, Congress had no such power, as its authority was absolutely limited to making calls upon the states for the military forces needed to create and maintain the army, each state being bound for its quota as called. But it is indisputable that the states, in response to the calls made upon them, met the situation when they deemed it necessary by directing enforced military service on the part of the citizens. In fact, the duty of the citizen to render military service and the power to compel him against his consent to do so was expressly sanc-

When the Constitution came to be formed it may not be disputed that one of the recognized necessities for its adoption was the want of power in Congress to raise an army and the dependence upon the states for their quotas. In supplying the power it was manifestly intended to give it all and leave none to the states, since, besides the delegation to Congress of authority to raise armies, the Constitution prohibited the states, without the consent of Congress, from keeping troops in time of peace or engaging in war. Article 1, § 10.

To argue that, as the state authority over the militia prior to the Constitution embraced every citizen, the right of Congress to raise an army should not be considered as granting authority to compel the citizen's service in the army, is but to express in a different form the denial of the right to call any citizen to the army. Nor is this met by saying that it does not exclude the right of Congress to organize an army by voluntary enlistments, that is, by the consent of the citizens, for if the proposition be true, the right of the citizen to give consent would be controlled by the same prohibition which would deprive Congress of the right to compel unless it can be said that although Congress had not the right to call, because of state authority, the citizen had a right to obey the call and set aside state authority if he pleased to do so. And a like conclusion demonstrates the want of foundation for the contention that although it be within the power to call the citizen into the army without his consent, the army into which he enters after the call is to be limited in some respects to services for which the militia, it is assumed, may only be used, since this admits the appropriateness of the call to military service in the army and the power to make it, and yet destroys the purpose for which the call is authorized,—the raising of armies to be under the control of the United States.

The fallacy of the argument results from confounding the constitutional provisions concerning the militia with that conferring upon Congress the power to raise armies. It treats them as one while they are different. This is the militia clause:

"The Congress shall have power . . . To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions; to provide for organizing, arming and disciplining, the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the states, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." Article 1, § 8.

The line which separates it from the army power is not only inherently plainly marked by the text of the two clauses, but will stand out in bolder relief by considering the condition before the Constitution was adopted and the remedy which it provided for the military situation with which it dealt. The right, on the one hand, of Congress under the Confederation to call on the states for forces, and the duty, on the other, of the states to furnish when called, embraced the complete power of government over the subject. When the two were combined and were delegated to Congress, all governmental power on that subject was conferred: a result manifested not only by the grant made but by the limitation expressly put upon the states on the subject. The army sphere, therefore, embraces such complete authority. But the duty of exerting the power thus conferred in all its plenitude was not made at once obligatory, but was wisely left to depend upon the discretion of Congress as to the arising of the exigencies which would call it in part or in whole into play. There was left, therefore, under the sway of the states, undelegated, the control of the militia, to the extent that such control was not taken away by the exercise by Congress of its power to raise armies. This did not diminish the military power or curb the full potentiality of the right to exert it, but left an area of authority requiring to be provided for (the militia area) unless and until, by the exertion of the military power of Congress, that area had been circumscribed or totally disappeared. This, therefore, is what was dealt with by the militia provision. It diminished the occasion for the exertion by Congress of its military power beyond the strict necessities for its exercise by giving the power to Congress to direct the organization and training of the militia (evidently to prepare such militia in the event of the exercise of the army power), although leaving the carrying out of such command to the states. It further conduced to the same result by delegating to Congress the right to call on occasions which were specified for the militia force, thus again obviating the necessity for exercising the army power to the extent of being ready for every conceivable contingency. This purpose is made manifest by the provision preserving the organization of the militia so far as formed, when called for such special purposes, although subjecting the militia, when so called, to the paramount authority of the United States. Tarble's Case, 13 Wall. 397, 408, 20 L. ed. 597, 600. But because, under the express regulations, the power was given to call for specified purposes without exerting the army power, it cannot follow that the latter power, when exerted, was not complete to the extent of its exertion, and dominant. Because the power of Congress to raise armies was not required to be exerted to its full limit, but only as, in the discretion of Congress, it was deemed the public interest required, furnishes no ground for supposing that the complete power was lost by its partial exertion. Because, moreover, the power granted to Congress to raise armies, in its potentiality, was susceptible of narrowing the area over which the militia clause operated, affords no ground for confounding the two areas, which were distinct and separate, to the end of confusing both the powers and thus weakening or destroying both.

And upon this understanding of the two powers the legislative and executive authority has been exerted from the beginning. From the act of the first session of L.R.A.1918C.

Congress carrying over the army of the government under the Confederation to the United States under the Constitution (Act of September 29, 1789, chap. 25, 1 Stat. at L. 95) down to 1812, the authority to raise armies was regularly exerted as a distinct and substantive power, the force being raised and recruited by enlistment. Except for one act formulating a plan by which the entire body of citizens (the militia) subject to military duty was to be organized in every state (Act of May 8, 1792, chap. 33, 1 Stat. at L. 271), which was never carried into effect, Congress confined itself to providing for the organization of a specified number distributed among the states according to their quota, to be trained as directed by Congress and to be called by the President as need might require.<sup>5</sup> When the War of 1812 came, the result of these two forces composed the army to be relied upon by Congress to carry on the war. Either because it proved to be weak in numbers or because of insubordination developed among the forces called, and manifested by their refusal to cross the border,<sup>6</sup> the government determined that the exercise of the power to organize an army by compulsory draft was necessary and Mr. Monroe, the Secretary of War (Mr. Madison being President), in a letter to Congress, recommended several plans of legislation on that subject. It suffices to say that by each of them it was proposed that the United States deal directly with the body of citizens subject to military duty, and call a designated number out of the population between the ages of eighteen and forty-five for service in the army. The power which it was recommended be exerted was clearly an unmixed Federal power, dealing with the subject from the sphere of the authority given to Congress to raise armies, and not from the sphere of the right to deal with the militia as such, whether organized or unorganized. A bill was introduced giving effect to the plan. Opposition developed, but we need not stop to consider it, because it substantially rested upon the incompatibility of compulsory military service with free government,—a subject which, from what we have said, has been disposed of. Peace came before the bill was enacted.

Down to the Mexican War the legislation exactly portrayed the same condition of mind which we have previously stated. In that war, however, no draft was suggested, because the army created by the United States immediately resulting from the exercise by Congress of its power to raise armies, that organized under its direction from the militia and the volunteer commands which were furnished, proved adequate to carry the war to a successful conclusion.

So, the course of legislation from that date to 1861 affords no ground for any other than the same conception of legislative power which we have already stated. In that year when the mutterings of the dread conflict which was to come began to be heard and the proclamation of the President calling a force into existence was issued, it was addressed to the body organized out of the militia and trained by the states in accordance with the previous acts of Congress. Proclamation of April 15, 1861, 12 Stat. at L. 1258. That force being inadequate to meet the situation, an act was passed authorizing the acceptance of 500,000 volunteers by the President to be by him organized into a national army. Act of July 22, 1861, chap. 9, 12 Stat. at L. 268. This was soon followed by another act increasing the force of the militia to be organized by the states for the purpose of being drawn upon when trained under the direction of Congress (Act of July 29, 1861, chap. 25, 12 Stat. at L. 281), the two acts, when considered together, presenting in the clearest possible form the distinction between the power of Congress to raise armies and its authority under the militia clause. But it soon became manifest that more men were required. As a result the Act of March 3, 1863 (chap. 75, 12 Stat. at L. 731, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 2308a (55)), was adopted, entitled, "An Act for Enrolling and Calling out the National Forces and for Other Purposes." By that act, which was clearly intended to directly exert upon all the citizens of the United States the national power which it had been proposed to exert in 1814, on the recommendation of the then Secretary of War, Mr. Monroe, every male citizen of the United States between the ages of twenty and forty-five was made subject by the direct action of Congress to be called by compulsory draft to service in a national army at such time and in such numbers as the President, in his discretion, might find necessary. In that act, as in the one of 1814, and in this one, the means by which the act was to be enforced were directly Federal, and the L.R.A.1918C.

force to be raised as a result of the draft was therefore typically national, as distinct from the call into active service of the militia as such. And under the power thus exerted four separate calls for draft were made by the President and enforced,—that of July, 1863, of February and March, 1864, of July and December, 1864, producing a force of about a quarter of a million men.<sup>7</sup> It is undoubted that the men thus raised by draft were treated as subject to direct national authority and were used either in filling the gaps occasioned by the vicissitudes of war in the ranks of the existing national forces or for the purpose of organizing such new units as were deemed to be required. It would be childish to deny the value of the added strength which was thus afforded. Indeed, in the official report of the Provost Marshal General, just previously referred to in the margin, reviewing the whole subject it was stated that it was the efficient aid resulting from the forces created by the draft at a very critical moment of the civil strife which obviated a disaster which seemed impending and carried that struggle to a complete and successful conclusion.

Brevity prevents doing more than to call attention to the fact that the organized body of militia within the states, as trained by the states under the direction of Congress, became known as the National Guard (Act of January 21, 1903, chap. 196, 32 Stat. at L. 775; National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, chap. 134, 39 Stat. at L. 211). And to make further preparation from among the great body of the citizens, an additional number, to be determined by the President, was directed to be organized and trained by the states as the National Guard Reserve. National Defense Act, supra.

Thus, sanctioned as is the act before us by the text of the Constitution, and by its significance as read in the light of the fundamental principles with which the subject is concerned, by the power recognized and carried into effect in many civilized countries, by the authority and practice of the Colonies before the Revolution, of the states under the Confederation, and of the government since the formation of the Constitution, the want of merit in the contentions that the act, in the particulars which we have been previously called upon to consider, was beyond the constitutional power of Congress, is manifest. Cogency, however, if possible, is added to the demonstration by pointing out that in the only case to which we have been referred where the constitutionality of the Act of 1863 was contemporaneously challenged on grounds akin to, if not absolutely identical with, those here urged, the validity of the act was maintained for reasons not different from those which control our judgment. Kneeder v. Lane, 45 Pa. 238. And as further evidence that the conclusion we reach is but the inevitable consequence of the provisions of the Constitution as effect follows cause, we briefly recur to events in another environment. The seceding states wrote into the Constitution which was adopted to regulate the government which they sought to establish, in identical words, the provisions of the Constitution of the United States which we here have under consideration. And when the right to enforce under that instrument a selective draft law which was enacted, not differing in principle from the one here in question, was challenged, its validity was upheld, evidently after great consideration, by the courts of Virginia, of Georgia, of Texas, of Alabama, of Mississippi, and of North Carolina, the opinions in some of the cases copiously and critically reviewing the whole grounds which we have stated. Burroughs v. Peyton, 16 Gratt. 470; Jeffers v. Fair, 33 Ga. 347; Daly v. Harris, 33 Ga. Supp. 38, 54; Barber v. Irwin, 34 Ga. 27; Parker v. Haughman, 34 Ga. 136; Ex parte Coupland, 26 Tex. 386; Ex parte Hill, 38 Ala. 429; State ex rel. Graham, 39 Ala. 437; State ex rel. Graham, 39 Ala. 459; Simmons v. Miller, 40 Miss. 19; Gatlin v. Walton, 60 N. C. (1 Winst. L.) 333, 408.

In reviewing the subject we have hitherto considered it as it has been argued from the point of view of the Constitution as it stood prior to the adoption of the 14th Amendment. But, to avoid all misapprehension, we briefly direct attention to that Amendment for the purpose of pointing out, as has been frequently done in the past,<sup>8</sup> how completely it broadened the national scope of the government under the Constitution by causing citizenship of the United States to be paramount and dominant instead of being subordinate and derivative, and therefore operating, as it does upon all the powers conferred by the Constitution, leaves no possible support for the contentions made, if their want of merit was otherwise not so clearly made manifest.

It remains only to consider contentions which, while not disputing power, challenge the act because of the repugnancy to the Constitution supposed to result from some of its provisions. First, we are of opinion that the contention that the act is void as a delegation of Federal power to state officials because of some of its administrative features is too wanting in merit to require further notice. Second, we think that the contention that the statute is void because vesting administrative officers with legislative discretion has been so completely adversely settled as to require reference only to some of the decided cases: Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 36 L. ed. 294, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 495; Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S. 470, 48 L. ed. 525, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 349; Intermountain Rate Cases (United States v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co.) 234 U. S. 476, 58 L. ed. 1408, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 986; First Nat. Bank v. Fellows, 244 U. S. 416, 61 L. ed. 1233, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 734. A like conclusion also adversely disposes of a similar claim concerning the conferring of judicial power. Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S. 470, 497, 48 L. ed. 525, 536, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 349; United States ex rel. West v. Hitchcock, 205 U. S. 80, 51 L. ed. 718, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 423; Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. v. Stranahan, 214 U. S. 320, 338-340, 53 L. ed. 1013, 1021, 1022, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 671; Zakonaite v. Wolf, 226 U. S. 272, 275, 57 L. ed. 218, 220, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 31. And we pass without anything but statement the proposition that an establishment of a religion or an interference with the free exercise thereof, repugnant to the 1st Amendment, resulted from the exemption clauses of the act to which we at the outset referred because we think its unsoundness is too apparent to require us to do more.

Finally, as we are unable to conceive upon what theory the exaction by government from the citizen of the performance of his supreme and noble duty of contributing to the defense of the rights and honor of the nation as the result of a war declared by the great representative body of the people can be said to be the imposition of involuntary servitude, in violation of the prohibitions of the 13th Amendment, we are constrained to the conclusion that the contention to that effect is refuted by its mere statement.

Affirmed.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS
EX REL. FRANZ SARTISON

v.

WALTER E. SCHMIDT, Chief Inspector of Grain, et al., Appts.

(281 Ill. 211, 117 N. E. 1037.)

Officer — wrongful dismissal — right to salary.

An employee under the civil service who is wrongfully dismissed from the service and subsequently reinstated under a court order cannot hold the public liable for his salary during his absence where it was paid to one who performed the duties of the office under a regular appointment to that position.

For other cases, see Officers, II. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

APPEAL by respondents from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Sangamon County granting a writ of mandamus to compel them to place relator's name on the pay roll and pay him for the time he was illegally laid off as a grain helper. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edward J. Brundage, Attorney General, and Clarence N. Boord, Assistant Attorney General, for appellants:

The payment of the salary provided for an office, or position in the nature of an office, to a de facto incumbent is a defense to a claim against the public corporation or officer making such payment, in an action against such corporation or officer by the de jure officer to recover such salary.

Messrs. P. K. Johnson and Stevens & Herndon for appellee.

Carter, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Franz Sartison, the relator, filed his petition for a writ of mandamus in the circuit court of Sangamon county in November, 1916. A demurrer being sustained, the relator thereafter filed an amended petition. Answers were filed by appellants, and the relator filed a general demurrer to said answer. This demurrer was sustained by the court, and, the appellants having elected to abide by their answer, the court ordered the writ of mandamus to issue. From that decretal order this appeal has been taken to this court.

The amended petition sets up, among other things, that on and prior to July 1, 1911, the relator held a place or position as grain helper in the East St. Louis grain inspection office of the state, and continued to hold that position until September 1, 1915, under the classified civil service of the state; that during said time he performed his duties in said position in a satisfactory and efficient manner; that on August 25, 1915, he received a letter from the deputy chief inspector informing him that he was discharged from the service, and that charges had been filed against him by the state Civil Service Commission; that thereafter he reported daily for work, but from and after September 1, 1915, he was not allowed to work as grain helper; that on September 15, 1915, he received from the state Civil Service Commission a copy of the charges against him, charging that he had failed to obey the orders of superior officers and submit to certain examinations held by the state Civil Service Commission; that on October 23, 1915, he received a notice that he was discharged from said position; that on January 28, 1916, he received from the state Civil Service Commission a copy of an order stating that, on account of the decision of the superior court in People ex rel. Estelle S. Baird v. Stevenson, he had been reinstated and would be allowed to resume his work as grain helper on February 1, 1916. The relator prayed that the respondents be required to place his name upon the pay roll and pay him for the time he was illegally laid off as grain helper.

The respondents in their answer admitted the facts as to the discharge and restoration of the relator as grain helper, and also averred that, from September 1, 1915, until February 5, 1916, James A. Routh, who was eligible under the state Civil Service Law (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1915-16, chap. 24a) for grain helper in the state grain inspection department at East St. Louis, was appointed to that position by the proper officials of the state, and worked and received pay for his work in said position from September 1, 1915, to February 6, 1916. Respondents further alleged in their answer that there was no money appropriated in the appropriation bill for the year 1915 other than the money paid to Routh for service in said office that could be used for the payment of relator.

It is clear from the allegations of the petition and answer that the salary provided to be paid to the relator as grain helper in the East St. Louis grain inspection office was paid to James A. Routh during the time for which relator is now seeking to recover pay, and the principal question to be decided here is whether the payment of a salary provided for an office or position to a de facto employee or officer in said position is a good defense to a claim against the public corporation making such payment, in an action against such corporation by a de jure officer or employee to recover such salary. This court in People ex rel. Phillips v. Lieb, 85 Ill. 484, cited with approval Brown v. Lunt, 37 Me. 428, where a de facto officer is described as one who actually performs the duties of the office with apparent right, under claim or color of appointment or election. This court also in the same case quoted from Ex parte Strang, 21 Ohio St. 610, where it is said: "The true doctrine seems to be that it is sufficient if the officer holds the office under some power having color of authority to appoint; and that a statute, though it should be found repugnant to the Constitution, will give such color."

See also, as to a definition of de facto officer, Lavin v. Cook County, 245 Ill. 496, 92 N. E. 291. We think, under these decisions, there can be no question that Routh was holding the office or position in question de facto. The general rule is that, if the payment of the salary or other compensation to be made by the government is made in good faith to the officer de facto while he is still in possession of the office the government cannot be compelled to pay a second time to the officer de jure when he has recovered the office,—at least where the officer de facto held the position by color of title. Mechem, Pub. Off. § 332; L.R.A.1918C.

McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 518. This rule, however, is not followed in all jurisdictions. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 429. This author also says in this last cited section: "For reasons of public policy, and recognizing payment to a de facto officer while he is holding the office and discharging its duties as a defense to an action brought by the de jure officer to recover the same salary, it is held in many jurisdictions that an officer or employee who has been wrongfully removed or otherwise wrongfully excluded from office cannot recover against the city for salary during the period when his office was filled and his salary paid to another appointee. In some jurisdictions, too, this rule is applied to payments made to de facto occupants of positions which are mere employments and do not rise to the dignity of offices."

In our judgment the rule governing payments to a de facto officer is founded on public policy, and applies with the same force to payments made to a de facto occupant of a position of public employment although not an officer, and this is the rule laid down in Martin v. New York, 176 N. Y. 371, 68 N. E. 640.

The authorities are in hopeless conflict on the question whether the de jure officer can recover from the public authorities the salary that has been paid in good faith to the de facto officer. The leading case, perhaps, holding that no such recovery can be had, is Dolan v. New York, 68 N. Y. 274, 279, 23 Am. Rep. 168, where it was said: "It is the settled doctrine in this state that the right to the salary and emoluments of a public office attach to the true and not to the mere colorable title, and in an action brought by a person claiming to be a public officer for the fees or compensation given by law his title to the office is in issue, and if that is defective and another has the real right, although not in possession, the plaintiff cannot recover."

. . . But it does not follow, from the conclusion that the defendant could have successfully defended an action brought by Keating to recover the salary of assistant clerk, that it was not justified in treating him as an officer de jure when claiming it, and paying it upon that assumption. It is clear that, if the city could rightfully pay the salary to Keating during his actual incumbency, and has paid it, it cannot be required to pay it again to the plaintiff. We are of opinion that payment to a de facto public officer of the salary of the office, made while he is in possession, is a good defense to an action brought by the de jure officer to recover the same salary after he has acquired or regained possession. . . . Public policy accords with this view. Public offices are created in the interest and for the benefit of the public. . . . It is important that the public offices should be filled, and that at all times persons may be found ready and competent to exercise official powers and duties. If, on a controversy arising as to the right of an officer in possession, and upon notice that another claims the office, the public authorities could not pay the salary and compensation of the office to the de facto officer except at the peril of paying it a second time if the title of the contestant should subsequently be established, it is easy to see that the public service would be greatly embarrassed and its efficiency impaired. Disbursing officers would not pay the salary until the contest was determined, and this, in many cases, would interfere with the discharge of official functions."

Many of the various authorities on this question pro and con are referred to and commented on in a note to Nall v. Coulter, 4 Ann. Cas. 673. See also El Paso County v. Rohde, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 794, and note (41 Colo. 258, 124 Am. St. Rep. 134, 95 Pac. 551); Stearns v. Sims, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 475, and note (24 Okla. 623, 104 Pac. 44); 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 812; 29 Cyc. 1430.

A discussion of the different views on this question is found in the majority and minority opinions of the supreme court of Michigan on this subject in Board of Auditors v. Benoit, 20 Mich. 176, 182, 4 Am. Rep. 382. It was there said in the majority opinion: "If courts themselves, when called on for affirmative action in aid of an officer, cannot inquire into his title, it cannot be reasonable to allow or to expect other bodies or persons to do so. No case is to be found in which such an inquiry has been sanctioned, and nothing could be more unsafe."

Again, on page 184: "There may be cases where the redress of the aggrieved party will be difficult, but the public convenience is not on that account to be sacrificed. It is important to have the right man in office, but it is more important to be able to deal safely with those who are actually in place, and there would be great hardship in allowing the whole public interests to be thrown into confusion whenever a contest arises for office. It would invite rather than prevent litigation, if every claimant understood that by setting up a claim to office he could stop the salary of the incumbent."

Judge Cooley in a very vigorous dissenting opinion argued in favor of a contrary rule, insisting that it was the duty L.R.A.1918C.

of public officials, if they had any doubt about the question, to compel the de facto officer to sue for his pay, and thus there would be no obstacle in the way of inquiring legally as to whether he was entitled to hold the office or not.

This court has never been called upon to pass on this precise question. See reasoning in Mayfield v. Moore, 53 Ill. 428, 5 Am. Rep. 52. In Chicago v. Luthardt, 191 Ill. 516, 522, 61 N. E. 410, the plaintiff brought suit to recover his salary while wrongfully excluded from his position of chief clerk of the detective bureau, which had been held to be in the classified civil service of the city. The court, in discussing this question, after holding that Luthardt was entitled to the position under the Civil Service Law, said: "The duties of the office during the time for which recovery is sought, it is true, were performed, and the office held, by one Joyce, who was a sergeant of detectives in the department of police, for which latter position a salary of $125 per month was appropriated. It does not appear that Joyce received the salary pertaining to appellee's office, and we regard it as immaterial that the appropriation for the police department of the city for the year 1898 is exhausted. If exhausted, it was without authority of law, so far as concerns appellee's salary, as it does not appear to have been paid to Joyce, who, without warrant of law, held appellee's office and performed its duties."

In Bullis v. Chicago, 235 Ill. 472, 480, 85 N. E. 614, the court, in discussing a somewhat similar question, said: If appellee was wrongfully prevented from performing the duties of his office he may recover his salary for the time during which he was so prevented, where it has not been paid to anyone performing the duties of the office."

It is clear that the court in these two cases did not intend to hold, contrary to the general rule, that payment made in good faith to a de facto officer constitutes a bar against the city to a claim for the same salary made by the officer de jure; and nothing was said by this court to the contrary in People ex rel. Blachly v. Coffin, 279 Ill. 401, 117 N. E. 85; People ex rel. Baird v. Stevenson, 270 Ill. 569, 110 N. E. 814; People ex rel. Mosby v. Stevenson, 272 Ill. 215, 111 N. E. 595; or People ex rel. Sellers v. Brady, 262 Ill. 578, 105 N. E. 1. In those cases the question at issue was not whether the relator was entitled to the salary after it had been paid to another, but whether or not he was entitled to the office, and incidentally to the salary. The question has never been passed upon by this court, where the salary has been paid, whether it could be recovered again from the city by the de jure officer. If the salary or compensation has been paid in good faith to a de facto employee during the time the position was in his possession, it cannot, on principle, and by the weight of authority, be recovered again from the city, county, state, or other governmental subdivision by the de jure officer.

Our conclusion on this question renders it unnecessary for us to consider or pass on the subsidiary questions raised in the briefs.

The judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed.

Annotation—Payment made to de facto officer as defense to an action for salary by de jure officer.

Earlier cases on this question are collected and discussed in notes to State ex rel. Greeley County v. Milne, 19 L.R.A. 689; El Paso County v. Rhode, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 794; and Stearns v. Sims, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 475.

PEOPLE EX REL. SARTISON v. SCHMIDT, ante, 370, is in accord with the weight of authority as shown by the cases cited in the earlier notes above referred to.

The following cases also, decided since the preparation of the earlier notes, support the majority rule that payment in good faith of the salary to a de facto officer is a good defense to a claim for salary during the same period by the de jure officer against a municipality or other public corporation: Walden v. Headland (1908) 156 Ala. 562, 47 So. 79; Thompson v. Denver (1916) 61 Colo. 470, 158 Pac. 309; People ex rel. Durante v. Burdett (1918) — Ill. —, 118 N. E. 1009; Terre Haute v. Burns (1917) — Ind. App. —, 116 N. E. 604, rehearing denied in (1917) — Ind. App. —, 117 N. E. 519; Walters v. Paducah (1909) — Ky. —, 123 S. W. 287; Dolan v. Louisville (1911) 142 Ky. 818, 135 S. W. 272; Patterson v. State (1913) 92 Neb. 729, 139 N. W. 643 (holding that state officer deprived of the office by an injunction wrongfully issued could not compel state to pay salary to him for time during which he performed none of the duties of the office, where it had paid the salary to the de facto officer); Hallowell v. Buffalo County (1917) — Neb. —, 162 N. W. 650; New York v. Voorhis (1911) 129 N. Y. Supp. 832; State ex rel. Powell v. Fassett (1912) 69 Wash. 555, 125 Pac. 963.

The case of People ex rel. Blachly v. Coffin (1917) 279 Ill. 401, 117 N. E. 85, in so far as it conflicts with the above rule, was overruled in People ex rel. Durante v. Burdett (Ill.) supra.

The rule is recognized also in Dinneen v. Bradford (1914) 190 Ill. App. 289, which is affirmed in (1916) 267 Ill. 486, 108 N. E. 732, and in North v. Battle Creek (1915) 185 Mich. 592, 152 N. W. L.R.A.1918C.

194. But in the latter case it was held to have no application, because the one to whom the salary had been paid did not perform the duties of the office with apparent right thereto, so as to make him a de facto officer; the appointment under which he assumed to act having been made by one whose authority to make the appointment had been divested by a new city charter.

And in Ardmore v. Sayre (1916) — Okla. —, 154 Pac. 356, it was held that the rule that payment of the salary of an office to a de facto officer defeats the right of the de jure officer to recover the salary of such office does not apply to a mere usurper of the office, or one pretending to hold the office without any color of title thereto. The court distinguished the case of Stearns v. Sims (1909) 24 Okla. 623, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 475, 104 Pac. 44, holding in accord with the general rule, as follows: "In the instant case the pretended appointment, being absolutely void, made without even a color of power or right, was simply a nullity. . . . The case of Stearns v. Sims (Okla.) supra, is distinguished from the instant case in this: That in the case cited, holding that the de jure officer could not recover from the city where the salary had been paid to the de facto officer, the de jure officer had been suspended by the district court as provided by law, and the de facto officer appointed by the legal appointing power. There was no question of jurisdiction either in the power of the court to suspend or the power to fill the vacancy during suspension. The temporary officer was clearly a de facto officer. It would certainly be extending the doctrine to a dangerous point to say that an officer could be displaced by a power or body without any colorable right or jurisdiction, and another person placed in the position, and the salary paid to the pretended officer, and thereby defeat the regular officer of his right to recover his salary from the paying body, especially where the pretended, wrongful removal is made by the same power that is responsible for the payment."

The rule above indicated was applied in Hallowell v. Buffalo County (1917) — Neb. —, 162 N. W. 650, in holding that one removed from the office of county judge by a judgment of the district court declaring the office vacant was not entitled to his salary during the time of removal, on reinstatement to the office by the decision of the supreme court to the effect that the district court was without jurisdiction in the matter and its judgment void, where the salary had been paid to one who was appointed by the county board to fill the vacancy, and who duly qualified and performed the duties of the office.

And the rule was held to apply in Thompson v. Denver (1916) 61 Colo. 470, 158 Pac. 309, to a police operator, an appointive officer. The court stated that the city charter in effect declared police operators to be officers, and it followed that they were, at least in some respects, public officers, their duties being intimately connected with and a part of the police system; that no distinction could safely be made on the basis of comparative dignity between officers, or on the fact that some were appointive and others elective; and that logically the rule should apply alike to all public officers.

The rule is based on public policy, to the effect that the people cannot be compelled to pay twice for the same service. Ibid,

And the reasons for the majority rule are well stated in Terre Haute v. Burns (1917) — Ind. App. —, 116 N. E. 604, rehearing in which is denied in (1917) — Ind. App. —, 117 N. E. 519, as follows: "Where a de facto officer has received from the proper officers the salary attached to the office for the time he occupied the office and discharged the duties thereof, the decided weight of authority is to the effect that the municipality is not liable to the de jure officer for such salary, though he may obtain possession of the office and show that he has been wrongfully kept out of the same. . . . The prevailing rule above announced is based upon the rights and convenience of the public who have dealings with the office so held by such officer. The rule as generally announced does not deny the de jure officer the right to recover from the de facto officer who has kept him out of the office to which he was legally entitled the salary or emoluments accruing during the time he was so excluded, but it extends the rule which validates the acts of de facto officers, and protects third parties dealing with them, to the municipality under which the office is held, and protects it in the payment of the salary or the emoluments of the office to the de facto officer, without requiring it to first determine, at its peril, the title or right to the office in question. The prevailing rule above announced is generally held to be supported by public policy. That disbursing officers and third persons dealing with reputed public officers in actual possession of the office and discharging the duties thereof can neither be expected to know, nor be required at their peril to inquire into, the validity of the title to such office or the qualifications of such officer; that as to such persons the occupant of the office so discharging its duties must be held to be what he appears, and assumes to be, viz., a duly authorized and qualified public official; that any other rule would impede the discharge of public business and tend to uncertainty and inefficiency in discharging the duties of the office, and in some instances occasion unnecessary loss or hardships. Another consideration amply supports the prevailing rule, viz., that it is for the best interests of the community that public offices shall be filled and the duties pertaining thereto be promptly and efficiently discharged; that to secure ends it is generally necessary to pay the officer who discharges the duties of the office with reasonable promptness; that payment in good faith to the de facto officer by the municipality or person liable for the salary or emoluments due the officer is deemed to be both expedient and justifiable. To the public, or the municipality, the important thing is the discharge of the duties of the office by some competent official. The questions of who is entitled to hold the office and receive the payment of the salary are secondary in importance, and may well be left to the parties directly concerned, except as above indicated."

The minority view, that payment by a city to the de facto officer of the salary is not a defense to an action against the city by the de jure officer, is supported by the case of Cleveland v. Luttner (1915) 92 Ohio St. 493, 111 N. E. 280, Ann. Cas. 1917D. 1134, in which it was held that policemen wrongfully discharged could recover salary for the time they were excluded from the office, after they had been reinstated, although other policemen had been appointed in their stead and had drawn the salary of the office during such time. The court said: "A public officer is a public servant, whether he be a policeman of a municipality or the President of the United States. His candidacy for appointment or election, his commission, his oath in connection with the law under which he serves, and the emoluments of his office, constitute the contract between him and the public he serves. The Constitution of Ohio guarantees to everyone redress for any injury done him in his land, goods, person, reputation, etc., and assures him remedy by due course of law, and that justice shall be administered without denial or delay. If the public servant, a policeman in this case, be wrongfully dismissed from public office, he should have the same remedy for such wrong as a private servant for any wrong done him in his employment. The theory in both cases should be to make the wronged party whole; that is, to reimburse him for his loss. The mere fact that the wronging party employs or appoints someone else during the period of wrongful ouster should not excuse him for the full measure of his duty and liability."

So the view was taken in San Antonio v. Steingruber (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 177 S. W. 1023, that where the de jure officer is wrongfully ousted the mere fact that the salary is paid to a de facto officer does not deprive the de jure officer of his right to recover the same during the period of removal. The court said that to so hold, regardless of whether the payment was made over the protest of the de jure officer, and despite reasonable efforts on his part to prevent it, would be unjust. It should be observed, however, that in this case the evidence was held to show such an abandonment of the office by the one removed therefrom as precluded him from recovering the salary,—it appearing that after removal he ceased to demand the salary, which was payable monthly, and did not seek to prevent the payment thereof to the de facto officer, or to protest against such payment; that he never notified the mayor or city council that he did not consider himself discharged; and that he took no steps to recover the office or the salary until after the term of office had expired.

And the fact that the city might be unable to recover the salary paid to the de facto officer, because of the latter's insolvency, was held in San Antonio v. Steingruber (Tex.) supra, immaterial as regards the rights of the de jure officer to recover from the city the salary during the time he was wrongfully deprived of the office.

The doctrine that payment of the salary to the de facto officer is not a defense in a claim by the de jure officer against a county for the same salary is approved (obiter) in Hogan v. Hamilton County (1915) 132 Tenn. 554, 179 S. W. 128, on the authority of Memphis v. Woodward, 12 Heisk. (Tenn.) 499, 27 Am. Rep. 750, which is cited in the note on this question in 19 L.R.A. 689.

Importance does not seem to be attributed in most of the above cases to the fact that when the salary was paid to the de facto officer the right to the office was being contested and that the public corporation may have had notice of the contest. Thus, in Thompson v. Denver (1916) 61 Colo. 470, 158 Pac. 309, the de jure officer was held not entitled to recover from the municipality salary for a period during which he had been wrongfully excluded from the office where the salary had been paid to the de facto officer, although the exclusion covered a period of over two years, while an appeal was pending from the decision of the police board discharging him from the service.

And it was held in Walters v. Paducah (1909) — Ky. —, 123 S. W. 287, that the question whether a municipality was liable for salary to a de jure officer during the time he was wrongfully deprived of the office, where it had paid the salary to a de facto officer, did not depend on the question whether the payment was made with notice of a contest or claim by another party to the office, but depended on whether the payment was made before or after judgment of ouster. The court said that in every case there is necessarily a contest between the de facto and de jure officers, that the duties of the office must be performed, and the city through its officers must recognize one or the other; and that the municipality could not be held responsible for the mistake of its officers in recognizing the wrong claimant.

It was accordingly held in Walters v. Paducah (Ky.) supra, that the fact that the municipality knew that the right to the office of city treasurer was contested, and that a third party, who was afterwards adjudged the de jure officer, was assuming to perform certain duties of the office, although without recognition of his right to do so by the municipal authorities, did not render it liable to the latter for the salary which it had paid to the de facto officer, who was in possession of the office and of its records.

and who paid out the money of the city to settle claims against it, and was recognized as the acting officer.

The intimation in Walters v. Paducah (Ky.) supra, that voluntary payment of the salary to the de facto officer will not be a defense if made after notice of adjudication of the rights of the de jure officer is supported by the cases of Markus v. Duluth (1917) — Minn. —, 164 N. W. 906, and New York v. Voorhis (1911) 129 N. Y. Supp. 832. In the former case, in the syllabus by the court, the rule is laid down that payment of the compensation to a de facto officer, who is installed in the office, with notice of the right of the de jure officer, who was wrongfully excluded from the office, is no defense to an action by the de jure officer to recover the compensation for the period of wrongful exclusion. This rule was applied where the city paid the salary to the de facto officer, with knowledge that the de jure officer had previously, in an action in court, established his right to the office.

And in New York v. Voorhis (N. Y.) supra, it was held not a defense to a claim against a city, by one wrongfully removed from office, for salary during the period of removal, that the salary has been paid to the de facto officer, if such payment was made pending an unsuccessful appeal from an adjudication that the one removed was the de jure officer; the remedy of the city being against the de facto officer for reimbursement.

Under a statute providing that when the title to office is contested by proceedings instituted in any court for that purpose no warrant can thereafter be drawn or paid for any part of the salary until the proceeding has been finally determined, it was held in Wynne v. Butte (1912) 45 Mont. 417, 123 Pac. 531, that it was not a defense to an action by a chief of police, for his salary for a period during which he was wrongfully prevented from discharging the duties of the office, that after he had instituted quo warranto proceedings the salary had been paid to a de facto officer.

And it was held also in Wynne v. Butte (Mont.) supra, that the city could not avoid the subsequent payment on the ground that it did not receive notice of the pendency of the quo warranto proceedings, owing to the failure of the clerk of the district court to certify to the disbursing officer, as required by statute, the fact that the title to the office was contested.

Payment to the de facto officer is matter of defense, to be pleaded by the defendant in an action by the de jure officer against a municipality for the salary during the time he was wrongfully deprived of the office, and it is not necessary that plaintiff allege that payment of the salary was not made to a de facto officer. San Antonio v. Steingruber (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 177 S. W. 1023.

The question of liability of a de facto officer to the rightful incumbent for compensation and fees is treated in a note to Albright v. Sandoval, 54 L. ed. (U. S.) 502, in which it is said that "the authorities are well-nigh unanimous that the rightful incumbent of a public office may recover from the de facto officer the salary, fees, and emoluments of the office received by the latter during his possession of the office." The court erred in admitting evidence, and submitting it to the jury, as to whether or not defendant was negligent in not discovering decedent's peril and protecting him from its consequences, for the reason that whatever defendant's duty in the premises might have been as to others than decedent, it did not owe such duty to him, and there can be no negligence where there is no duty.

Willis v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 164 Ky. 124, 175 S. W. 18.

Messrs. Daugherty & Fulton, C. P. Bradbury, and Ernest N. Fulton for appellee.

Clay, C., filed the following opinion:

N. B. Bowling, as administrator of J. T. Payne, deceased, brought this suit under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (Act April 22, 1908, chap. 149, 35 Stat. at L. 65, Comp. Stat. 1916, §§ 8657-8665) against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, to recover damages for his death. The jury returned a verdict in his favor for $5,050, of which sum they apportioned $5,000 to the decedent's widow, and $50 to his daughter. Judgment was entered accordingly, and the railroad company appeals.

According to appellee's evidence, appellant is an interstate carrier, and at the time of his death decedent was in its employ as car inspector and repairer. At about 6 o'clock on the morning of the accident, which occurred on October 25, 1915, J. R. Carpenter, the company's chief car inspector, met decedent and said, "53 is called." This was an order to the decedent to inspect the cars and see that they were ready to go out. These cars were assembled on track No. 1, in the Lebanon Junction yards, and 53 was an interstate train. About 8 o'clock that morning train No. 18 arrived at Lebanon Junction from Bowling Green. At that time there were eight empty cars on track No. 1. After doing some other switching, the engine on train No. 18 pushed a cut of four cars onto the north end of track No. 1. Two attempts were made to couple this cut of cars to the eight cars already on that track, but because of some defect in the apparatus the coupling was not made. During this movement the eight cars were shoved for a distance of about three or four car lengths. After this movement, decedent was found dead under the south trucks of the sixth car from the north end and the third car from the south end, with one of his legs wedged between the arch bars and the wheel. While the cut of four cars was being shoved on track No. 1, no employee was on the front car. There was also evidence to the effect that no signal of the approach of the four cars was given. It was further shown that the tracks in the yards of the company at Lebanon Junction were used by a large number of employees. Though the rules of the company require that a workman going under or between cars should protect himself with a blue flag, Bates the yardmaster, testified that the inspectors were not in the habit of placing blue flags when inspecting trains, and that this custom had prevailed for a number of years. It was also shown that it was the custom in the yards, when coupling an engine and cars to a cut of dead cars, to send a brakeman ahead to inspect the cut of cars.

According to the evidence for the company, the chief car inspector gave the decedent no order with reference to train 53, and decedent had no duties to perform in connection with the cut of cars on track No. 1. As a matter of fact, they had been inspected the night before by an employee charged with that duty. It was further shown that the eight cars in question did not go out on train 53 that day, but constituted a part of another train. It was not customary for the whistle to be blown under such circumstances, but the bell on the engine was ringing as the engine backed into the cars. If decedent was under or between the cars, he could not have been seen; otherwise, he could have been seen. The head brakeman looked down both sides of the eight cars, but did not see anybody. If the decedent was under or between the cars, it was his duty to protect himself with a blue flag. The company had no rule requiring trainmen or switchmen to look out for car repairers who did not protect themselves in this manner.

1. The first ground urged for a reversal is that the case should not have gone to the jury, because appellee failed to prove that the decedent's death was due to any negligence on the part of the company. In this connection it is argued that the evidence utterly fails to show for what purpose, or under what circumstances, or at what time, the decedent went under or between the cars, and that the case therefore falls within the well-recognized rule that, where the decedent's death may as well be attributed to a cause for which the company was not responsible as to a cause for which it was responsible, the company's liability should not be made a matter of mere conjecture on the part of the jury. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Long, 139 Ky. 304, 117 S. W. 359; Louisville Gas Co. v. Kaufman, S. & Co. 105 Ky. 181, 48 S. W. 434. With this contention we cannot agree. There was positive evidence that the decedent was notified that No. 53 had been called, and that this notice was equivalent to an order to inspect the cars which were to compose that train and see that they were in condition to go out. The cars which went out on that train were usually assembled on track No. 1. Decedent's body was found wedged between the arch bars and the wheels of one of the cars assembled on that track. Having been directed to work there, it is a fair and reasonable inference that at the time of the accident he was engaged in the performance of his duties. The theory of suicide is not to be entertained. The peculiar position of decedent's body is sufficient to justify the conclusion that his injuries did not take place while the cars were standing still, but were due to the admitted movement of the cars, and as there was evidence tending to show that this movement was caused by their contact with the cut of cars which the company had backed on the track in question without keeping a proper lookout or giving timely warning of their approach, it was for the jury to say whether the company's negligence was the proximate cause of decedent's death.

It is further insisted that the company did not owe decedent any duty because of his failure to apprise its employees of his presence under or between the cars by means of a blue flag, as required by the company's rules. There may be cases where no duty arises until the employee places the warning signal, but these are cases where the company is under no obligation to anticipate the presence of such employee. Kentucky & T. R. Co. v. Minton, 167 Ky. 516, 180 S. W. 831. We are not prepared, however, to hold that in every instance the railroad company has discharged its full duty to its car inspectors and repairers whose work is of a peculiarly hazardous character, by merely promulgating a rule requiring them to protect themselves by placing a certain flag. In yards like those at Lebanon Junction, where many men are employed, and several trains come and go each day, and a great deal of switching is done, and numerous cars must necessarily be inspected and repaired by men who frequently go under and between the cars for but a short period of time, we conclude that the company is under the humane duty to anticipate the presence of such employees under or between the cars, and to take such precautions for their safety as a proper lookout and timely warning of approaching cars will afford; and this duty is owing whether the injured employee protects himself by means of a blue flag or not, and particularly so where, as in this case, there was substantial evidence that the rule requiring such action on his part was habitually disregarded with the acquiescence of those employees of the company superior in authority to the injured employee. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Lovell, 141 Ky. 249, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 909, 132 S. W. 569; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Johnson, 161 Ky. 824, 171 S. W. 847; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Short, 171 Ky. 647, 188 S. W. 786.

But it is suggested that decedent assumed the risk of injury because of his failure to put out a blue flag, and is therefore not entitled to recover. Of course, it might be said that decedent's failure to put out a blue flag was the sole cause of his injuries, if the company owed him no lookout or warning duty in the absence of the flag, and the rule requiring him to protect himself in that manner had not been habitually disregarded with the acquiescence of the company. In view, however, of our conclusion that the company owed him a lookout and warning duty, notwithstanding his failure to observe the rule, it is clear that such failure cannot be regarded as the sole cause of his death, but might constitute contributory negligence going to the diminution of damages. This view of the law is well presented by the given instructions. Instructions Nos. A-2 and A-3 submitted the question whether the company owed decedent a lookout and warning duty, and whether or not its failure to perform either of these duties was the proximate cause of decedent's death. Instruction A-4 submitted the issue of contributory negligence. By instruction No. B-1, the jury were told that, if they believed from the evidence that decedent was concealed from view at the time of his injuries, and that he placed no blue flag on the ends of the cars, they should find for the defendant, unless they believed that the rule with reference to the placing of the blue flag was habitually disregarded with the acquiescence of the company, and should further believe as in instruction A-3. These instructions are assailed on the ground that the company was entitled to a peremptory, and there was no evidence to support them. This contention cannot be sustained for the reasons heretofore pointed out.

Complaint is made of the introduction of evidence of the use of the company's yards by persons other than its employees. This was not prejudicial, because in the instructions the lookout and warning duty was made solely to depend on the extent of the use of the yards by the company's employees.

Lastly, it is insisted that the instruction on the measure of damages is erroneous and that the verdict is excessive. The instruction on the measure of damages is attacked on the ground that it fails to limit the recovery to the present cash value of the future benefits of which the beneficiaries were deprived by the death of the decedent. By the given instruction the jury were told to fix the damages "in such an amount in money as will fairly and reasonably compensate the widow, Mrs. Mattie E. Payne, and the daughter, Miss Carrie Payne, of the said J. T. Payne, deceased, for the loss of pecuniary benefits they might have reasonably received if the deceased had not been killed." There is nothing in this instruction that limits the right of the jury to fix the damages at the present worth of future benefits. That being true, and the company having failed to offer an instruction to that effect, it cannot complain of the instruction given. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Skinner, 177 Ky. 62, 197 S. W. 552; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Kelly, 241 U. S. 485, 60 L. ed. 1117, L.R.A.1917F, 367, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 630; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Shaw, 168 Ky. 537, 182 S. W. 653; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Henry, 168 Ky. 453, 182 S. W. 651; Phoenix R. Co. v. Landis, 231 U. S. 578, 58 L. ed. 377, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 179; Greenway v. Taylor County, 144 Iowa, 332, 122 N. W. 943; *Clark v. Nor can we say that the verdict is so excessive as to strike us at first blush as being the result of prejudice or passion.

Judgment affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

Annotation—Negligence in going without previous notice under or between cars liable to be moved at any time.

This note is supplementary to the note to Carey v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 877.

Generally, as to the constitutionality, application, and effect of the Federal Employer's Liability Act, see notes to Lamphere v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 38, and Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Horton, L.R.A.1915C, 47.

As to contributory negligence as affected by illegal or negligent custom of servants, see the note to Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Lovell, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 909.

In the following cases an employee who had sought shelter from the rain under a car was held guilty of contributory negligence precluding recovery for injury sustained when the car was suddenly moved: Barrage v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (1915) 60 Pa. Super. Ct. 66; Cunningham v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (1915) 249 Pa. 134, 94 Atl. 467; Rega v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1914) 164 App. Div. 433, 149 N. Y. Supp. 843. Similar cases may be found on page 877 of note 46 L.R.A.(N.S.).

As stated in the note in 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 877, it is generally held that a railroad employee, when about to put himself in such a position with respect to a stationary car that, if it should be moved unexpectedly, he would in all probability be injured, is bound to notify all other employees whose work may, in its progress, produce a movement of the car, or put out a flag or other signal which will show them where he is.

Thus, the violation of such a rule by a repair man or inspector injured while at work under or between cars was, in the following cases, held to render him guilty of contributory negligence precluding a recovery: Roux v. Morgan's Louisiana & T. R. & S. S. Co. (1910) 127 La. 240, 53 So. 550; Abshire v. Louisiana R. & Nav. Co. (1917) 141 La. 194, 74 So. 901; Hart v. Bangor & A. R. Co. (1913) 110 Me. 540, 87 Atl. 221 (repair man injured while a fellow servant stood at each end of the car under which he was working); Gates v. Maine C. R. Co. (1914) 111 Me. 589, 90 Atl. 703; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Cofer (1913) 114 Va. 434, 76 S. E. 909. See also Pinckney v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (1911) 89 S. C. 525, 72 S. E. 394, where it is stated that, if it was proved that the injured repair man did disregard such a rule of the company, known to him to be in force and so essential to his own safety, as well as the safety of other employees and the general public, when he could have complied with it with reasonable effort on his part, and thus prevented the injury, then the non-suit was proper.

But when a railroad company has adopted rules for the protection of its employees, it is its duty to make known to them such rules; and there is no affirmative duty on the part of the employee to ascertain what these rules are. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Blaylock (1915) 117 Ark. 504, 175 S. W. 1170, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 563; Anderson v. Great Northern R. Co. (1907) 102 Minn. 355, 113 N. W. 913.

So it is held in Campbell v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1917) — Conn. —, 102 Atl. 597, in order to render an employee guilty of negligence in failing to observe a rule requiring employees to put out a protecting flag before going under a car to work, he must have been instructed to so protect himself. In this case, however, the court, in view of the absence of the flag and the other circumstances, held that the employees of the railroad company were not chargeable with negligence in moving the cars as they did toward the deceased, who was an employee of an oil company, within whose yards the accident occurred.

In some cases the question is presented whether an employee is guilty of contributory negligence in going under or between cars to work, relying upon another employee to put out a protecting flag or give warning of danger.

Thus, whether a car repairer was guilty of contributory negligence in going under a car relying upon a foreman to put out a flag was held a question for the jury in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Blaylock (Ark.) supra, it being a disputed question whether it was the duty of each workman when going under a car to put out the blue flag, or the duty of the foreman to do so, under the rule requiring that "workman will display the blue signals and the same workman remove them."

It was stated in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Steel (1917) — Ark. —, 197 S. W. 288, that a foreman had no right to suspend or abrogate a blue flag rule promulgated for the protection of employees, but that, when he assured a car repairer that he would protect or watch out for him while working under a car, it was a question for the jury to say whether the repairer, in the exercise of ordinary care, had the right to rely upon this promise as meaning that the foreman would give him that protection that the rules of the company required; that the foreman was the repairman's fellow servant in the matter of promising to protect him in such a case, and the jury were warranted in finding that the failure of the foreman, after promising to protect and watch out for him, was negligence on his part for which the carrier would be liable under the comparative negligence rule of the Federal Employers' Liability Act.

In Anderson v. Great Northern R. Co. (Minn.) supra, plaintiff was injured by the action of a switching crew in pushing other cars against the car which he was engaged in repairing on a "rip" track; the printed rules required repair men to post a blue flag as a protecting signal; plaintiff's testimony tended to show that the foreman instructed him that it was the duty of the first man who went to work to post the flag; that this was the practice, and that in this case a particular colaborer was the first man to begin the work. The court charged the jury that plaintiff could not recover if he knew of the printed rule, and submitted the question of whether he was guilty of contributory negligence in believing that his colaborer was the first man to begin work, and that he had posted the flag. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. The action of the trial court in refusing to disturb the verdict is sustained.

In Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Kitchens (1889) 83 Ga. 83, 9 S. E. 827, it was held no excuse on the part of a servant working under a car that his superior failed to obey a rule requiring the putting up of a danger signal which was applicable equally to both servants concerned in the violation of the rule, the court stating that a rule of a railroad company, applicable alike to all persons of a given class, is not to be evaded by the failure of one person of the class to observe the rule when another person of the same class is injured.

In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Winslow (1894) 56 Ill. App. 462, the rule required employees, when going to work under a car in a train, to put blue signals on both ends of the train; plaintiff, a car repairer, placed a blue flag at one end of the train and relied upon an inspector to put a flag at the other end, but the inspector failed to do so and plaintiff was injured when an engine moved the car under which he was working. In holding plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence, the court stated that plaintiff's injury was due to his failure to see that the flag was put up as required by the well-known rule, and his reliance upon the promise of the car inspector, combined with the negligence of another, who was not a servant or defendant, in failing to protect him.

So a car repairer was, in Johnson v. Cleveland, L. & W. R. Co. (1896) 11 Ohio C. C. 553, 5 Ohio C. D. 290, held guilty of contributory negligence in going under a car to work in violation of the blue flag rule, relying upon the promise of a conductor to protect him, the car repairer occupying no inferior position to the conductor and the latter having no control over him. The court said that the fact that the injured employee set aside the rules of the company and relied upon something he himself had devised would be a very good reason why he should not hold the company responsible.

In Pinckney v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (1911) 89 S. C. 525, 72 S. E. 394, where a car repairer went under a car relying upon the statement of the conductor of the train that he was through with his work in that vicinity, the court said: "The act of the conductor in running his train back and striking the cars standing on the siding under these circumstances furnished some evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant. It may be that the plaintiff's fellow laborer, Freeman, who, at plaintiff's request, was on watch against the approach of a train, was negligent in not signaling the train to stop, and in not warning plaintiff of its approach, and that his negligence was a proximate cause of the accident. If the negligence of Freeman, the fellow servant, was the sole proximate cause, or one of the proximate causes, the negligence of the plaintiff being the other, then the plaintiff could not recover. But if the proximate cause of the injury was the negligence of the defendant combined with the negligence of Freeman, the fellow servant, the plaintiff would not be precluded from recovery. We think the evidence required that these issues, and the issue of contributory negligence growing out of the rule requiring the use of a blue flag, should be submitted to the jury."

Where an inspector employed by one company went under a car to work from three to five minutes after the conductor of another company had told him that no more cars would be switched onto the track in question, the court, in Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Hennessey (1912) 177 Ind. 64, 97 N. E. 331, was of the opinion that an instruction "that he had a right, in going under the cars, to rely upon the statement of the conductor, and L.R.A.1918C.

to believe that he would not push or throw any other car on the track within so short a time as three to five minutes," should not have been given, but thought that the jury could not have been misled in view of the other instructions, which fully covered the question of the requirement of the use of the senses, the use of ordinary care, and freedom from contributory negligence. A judgment for plaintiff, however, was reversed on other grounds.

Where a car inspector in the employ of a railroad company went underneath a car, depending upon a helper to protect him against moving cars in accordance with a rule adopted between them, and the helper failed to warn the inspector of a car let down the track by a grain company, whereby the inspector was injured, the court, in J. Rosenbaum Grain Co. v. Mitchell (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 142 S. W. 121, stated that, if the helper was negligent in failing to perform a duty he owed to the car inspector, and if the grain company also was negligent, their negligence was concurrent, and the helper's negligence was no answer to the inspector's suit against the grain company, unless, as is further contended, the helper's negligence should be imputed to the inspector. The theory upon which it is claimed that negligence of the helper should be imputed to the inspector is that they were engaged in a joint enterprise and occupied towards each other the relation of principal and agent. The court held, however, that recovery for injury resulting from the negligence of the grain company in sending the car down the track in the manner it did could not be defeated on the aforesaid theory.

So in International & G. N. R. Co. v. Schubert (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 146 S. W. 1083, a case similar to the J. Rosenbaum Grain Co. Case, the evidence showed that the railroad company had adopted a rule, custom, or usage requiring its employees, before undertaking to do any work underneath its cars on a certain track, to display a red flag in the drawhead at each end of the car or string of cars, but the court found that the repairer, while realizing that the flags afforded such protection, was not apprised of this rule, and was not furnished by the company with any such flags for the purpose, and that, so far as he knew, the company had no such flags in use at the time; that the repairs in question could have been performed in ten or fifteen minutes; that before beginning the work, appreciating the danger incident to it, the repairer directed a helper to watch out for approaching cars; but that while he was engaged in work underneath the car, without any warning, a switch engine backed several cars against the one under which he was working, causing the injury complained of, it appearing that the helper had failed in his promise to keep a lookout for approaching cars or to notify the repairer of the danger. The court held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, the negligence of the helper, at best, being regarded as only a concurrent cause of the injury, and not as the proximate cause within the rule of an intervening efficient cause; that such failure on his part did not and could not break the causal connection between the negligent failure on the part of the railroad company to furnish the flags and the injury. The court also observed that the rule contended for in J. Rosenbaum Grain Co. v. Mitchell was not applicable, because there was no joint enterprise or undertaking between the car repairer and the helper that could establish such agency between the two that the act of one could bind the other; and that the negligence of the helper could be imputed to the car repairer.

The court in J. Rosenbaum Grain Co. v. Mitchell (Tex.) supra, cites as a similar case Abbitt v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. (1898) 150 Ind. 498, 50 N. E. 729, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 478, stating that "there it appeared that Abbitt and one Lichstein worked together as car inspectors, and that it was the duty of one, while the other was under a car, to keep a lookout for other cars which might be moved on the track, and to warn him of danger from a threatened collision between the car he was under and such other cars. Abbitt, while under a car inspecting it, was killed as the result of such a collision. There was testimony tending to show that Lichstein had failed to perform his duty to keep a lookout for and warn Abbitt of the approach of the colliding cars. The court said: 'It may be affirmed as a correct doctrine under the authorities that, if Abbitt and Lichstein were associated together in their work of car inspection at the time of the accident, and if, by any arrangement, understanding, or agreement between them, either express or implied, it became Lichstein's duty, when Abbitt was under a car upon the railroad track during the inspection of work performed by them, to look out for approaching trains or cars, and either signal them to stop or warn Abbitt of their approach, then, in this respect and to this extent, at least, Lichstein might be said to have been serving the former, and under such circumstances the relation of principal and agent in this regard could be said to exist between them; and if Lichstein neglected to discharge the duty so imposed upon him, and thereby contributed to the accident in question, such negligence in legal contemplation would be the negligence of Abbitt, and justly imputable to him. Or, in other words, if, under the circumstances, at the time of the fatal accident, Abbitt attempted or undertook to exercise the care which the law exacted of him through the agency of Lichstein, then it would be incumbent upon the plaintiff in this action to show, at the time of the accident, freedom from contributory negligence on the part of Lichstein.' The value of the decision as authority is weakened by the fact that two of the five judges composing the court dissented, and in a strong opinion combated the conclusion reached by the majority, that the principle in question was applicable to the case." It may also be observed that the car in the Abbitt case contained a green and a red light known as markers, used to indicate the rear end of a train when en route. It was left for the jury in that case to determine the duty of the railroad company with respect to these lights, and whether they could be considered as giving warning of the presence of a worker under the car.

In Yoakum v. Lusk (1917) — Mo. App. —, 193 S. W. 635, a servant, while procuring repair materials from a bad order car on an "old rip track," was killed between the cars when other cars were shunted onto the track without warning; a foreman had charge of this track, and it was his duty, when men were engaged to work on cars, to lock the switch and place in position a blue flag to notify switch crews that the track was closed, and thus prevent cars being shoved in while men were at work on cars standing thereon; there was in force at the time what is known as the blue flag rule, which provided that employees were not to work under or about a car unless the blue flag was up. It was contended that, if deceased had not violated that rule, he would not have been struck, and for that reason his death was chargeable solely to his own negligence. The court observes that, while the rule says that the presence of the blue flag denotes that workmen are at work under or about the car, engine, or train, and employees must not work at such places unless such blue signal is so placed, yet it nowhere states whose duty it is to put up the blue flag. To require the workman to see at all times that the blue flag was up before going between or under cars to work on either track would result in relieving the foreman of any duty to see to that at all, unless asked to do so by a workman. This certainly was not the intention of the rule, and the evidence is to the effect that primarily it was the duty of the foreman to know when workmen were engaged in work on the tracks and lock the switch and put up the blue flag without being asked to do so by anyone. The rule was intended for the safety of the workmen, and was not intended to be used as an avenue of escape by the master in case an injury should occur. Rules are only necessary when there are different workmen so engaged that unless rules are provided and obeyed one may injure another. If the workman is required to look out altogether for his own safety, and is solely responsible for it, then no rule is necessary, and the master cannot be charged with negligence if he does nothing to secure the safety of the servant. The court does not think this is what the rule above set out means. The master cannot escape responsibility or avoid his legal duty to use ordinary care to furnish his servants a reasonably safe place to work by promulgating a rule which places that responsibility on the servant. The duty of the master in this regard is a primary duty, and he cannot shift or avoid it, and the blue flag rule invoked in this case was not intended to accomplish that result. The primary purpose of this rule was to prevent switch crews from running cars in on these tracks while men were at work there, and the primary duty to see that the switch was locked and the blue flag up whenever there was necessity for it rested on the foreman, and not the workman. Should a workman discover that a track was open when it should be closed, he could not close it because Olson (foreman) had the key. All the workman could do would be to hunt up Olson and ask him to close and lock the switch. Further the court states that the ground of negligence which would authorize the submission to the jury at all was the failure of the rip track foreman to lock the switch and put up the blue flag when he knew, or had good reason to believe, that deceased was likely to be required to go to cars on the old rip track for L.R.A.1918C.

material with which to make the necessary repairs on the car on which he was working at the time, and this issue should have been submitted by an instruction couched in plain language, and on a retrial that may be done. With respect to the Employers' Liability Act, the court states that it may be conceded that deceased was negligent in going between the cars as he did; yet if appellants were also chargeable with negligence, they cannot, in this case, it being brought under the Federal law, escape liability in toto, but can only take advantage of his negligence for the purpose of reducing the damages; hence it is unnecessary in this connection to discuss the question of the negligence of deceased.

In McKee v. Cincinnati, F. & S. E. R. Co. (1914) 161 Ky. 711, 171 S. W. 425, where a judgment for defendant was affirmed, a laborer was injured while coupling air brakes between cars as directed by the superintendent. The question in issue was whether the superintendent, who was supervising the shifting of certain cars from the main track to a sidetrack upon which the injured employee was working, directed the cars to be sent upon that track without giving such employee a sufficient opportunity to get from between the cars. The jury were told that, if sufficient time had elapsed after the superintendent directed the coupling for the employee to reasonably obey the order, and if the superintendent saw the employee in a place of safety before the car was backed against the two cars between which he was injured, the superintendent had the right to presume that the employee had obeyed his order and was in a place of safety. The court stated this instruction was not prejudicial to any of plaintiff's substantial rights.

In connection with the above cases, as to reliance upon another employee to give the warning, see cases in the note in 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) at page 878.

As suggested in LOUISVILLE & N. R. Co. v. BOWLING, ante, 376, in yards where trains are frequent, and numerous cars must necessarily be inspected and repaired by men who frequently go under and between them for but a short time, the company is under the humane duty to anticipate the presence of such employees under or between the cars, and to take such precautions for their safety as a proper lookout and timely warning of approaching cars will afford; and this duty is owing whether the injured employee protects himself by means of a blue flag or not, and particularly is this so when the rule requiring such action on his part has been abrogated. So in the following cases, where such a rule had been abandoned or disregarded for such a time by the railroad company, or those whose duty it was to enforce it, as to amount to an abrogation of it, a car repairer or inspector injured while working under a car in disregard of the rule was held entitled to recover damages, the railroad being negligent in shunting cars upon him without warning: St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Sharp (1914) 115 Ark. 308, 171 S. W. 95 (under Federal Employers' Liability Act); Pullin v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (1915) 96 Kan. 165, 150 Pac. 604; Young v. Lusk (1914) 268 Mo. 625, 187 S. W. 849; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Perryman (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 160 S. W. 406; Texarkana & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Casey (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 172 S. W. 729; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ayers (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 192 S. W. 310; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Elliott (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 189 S. W. 737. In the last case the railroad company was held liable for injury to an employee caught between cars while repairing a hand hold; the question whether the "blue flag" rule had been abandoned by nonobservance being a question for the jury.

So a judgment for defendant was reversed in Luebke v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1883) 59 Wis. 127, 48 Am. Rep. 483, 17 N. W. 870, where an employee, while repairing a detached car on a side-track at the command of a foreman, was injured when a train struck the car under which he was working. The court said that it was not a dangerous service to go under a car for the purpose of making repairs when it was standing still and disconnected from any power which could move it, and was in a place where there was not the remotest reasonable suspicion or apprehension that it would be moved or at all disturbed; that the company had not provided a watchman or any other precaution which it admitted it was its duty to do; and this admission sufficiently disposed of the claim, most unworthily made, that it was the duty of the repairer himself, who was compelled to go under the cars to repair them, to provide his own watchman and look out for himself.

So, where a track foreman was charged with the duty of looking out for the safety of car repairers while at work, it was held, in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Mahoney (1913) 153 Ky. 761, 156 S. W. 1180, 1913 C.

388, that the car repairer had a right to assume that such foreman would protect him from moving cars while he was engaged in inspecting and repairing the car in question.

And where a trackman was killed while standing between cars when others were switched against them, the court, in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Johnson (1914) 161 Ky. 824, 171 S. W. 847, favored an instruction in substance that, if from the evidence the jury believed that the section crew with which the trackman was working had been directed or requested by the foreman to go behind or in front of or between cars for the purpose of urinating, or that it was usual and customary for section men to do this, and this usage or custom was known to the foreman of the trackman's crew, and the foreman knew that the trackman had gone in front of or between cars for the aforesaid purpose, and he saw, or in the exercise of ordinary care could have seen, the approaching car or cut of cars in time to have given warning, it was his duty to exercise ordinary care to warn the trackman of the danger he was in, and if he failed to give such warning, the jury should find for the plaintiff.

Where a repair man, while passing between the cars of a long freight train, was injured when the train was suddenly moved without warning, it was held, in Missouri, O. & G. R. Co. v. Dereberry (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 167 S. W. 30, that he did not assume the risk in view of the custom of repair men generally to pass between such trains, and the custom of the crew to sound a warning when such trains were about to be moved.

A yard conductor was held not guilty of negligence in Murphy v. Atlanta & C. Air Line R. Co. (1917) 102 S. C. 509, 87 S. E. 310, in passing between apparently dead cars, whereby he was injured when a coemployee, by mistake and contrary to the instructions of the yard conductor caused the cars to be kicked onto the wrong track; and the fact that the wrongful act was done by a fellow servant did not preclude a recovery by the conductor.

A car painter injured between cars while procuring a bucket of paint that he had deposited on a bumper was, in Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Parker (1914) 116 Va. 368, 82 S. E. 183, held not guilty of contributory negligence; the railroad company being negligent in suffering him to work on the shifting track without protecting with a blue flag the cut of cars upon which he was ordered to work, he having a right to rely upon that protection.

In Kettlehake v. American Car & Foundry Co. (1913) 171 Mo. App. 528, 153 S. W. 552, affirmed in (1915) 236 U. S. 311, 59 L. ed. 594, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 355, the car company was held liable for the death of an employee killed when a car under which he was working was moved by other cars switched onto the track; the court stating that the employee had a right to presume, in the absence of knowledge to the contrary, that the defendant would furnish him a reasonably safe place to work; that the employer would not imperil his safety by sending its other employees in to move the car upon which he was working without notifying him.

The above case bases its ruling on Koerner v. St. Louis Car Co. (1908) 209 Mo. 141, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 292, 107 S. W. 481, holding that a car manufacturer who sends a painter to work on a car owes him the duty of seeing that other cars are not run against it, and that cars pulled out are not attached to it, without giving him warning of intention to move the car; and that he is responsible for the negligence of his servant, of whatever grade, to whom he delegates performance of the duty; that one sent to paint a car is not negligent, as matter of law, in failing to place his scaffold so that it will clear the car steps in case the car moves, where he has a right to rely on the car not being moved without warning.

In Degitz v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (1916) 97 Kan. 654, 156 Pac. 743, the negligence of an employee killed while inspecting a car was held a question for the jury; the blue flag rule being applicable to persons going under cars to make repairs, and not to persons merely making an inspection.

So, in Gjorvad v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. (1911) 116 Minn. 233, 133 N. W. 609, a rule of defendant providing that car inspectors and repairers must not go between or beneath cars while cars are being switched in or out of trains was construed as applying only where such inspectors and repairers are actually engaged in the work of inspecting or repairing cars.

In Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Short (1916) 171 Ky. 647, 188 S. W. 786, the servant injured between cars was passing through them to get materials, and not for the purpose of making repairs, and the rule requiring employees, when going between cars in the nighttime to make repairs, to put lights on the cars, was held to have no application.

A car repairer who was killed while repairing a defective coupling, when other cars moved by gravity against the car on which he was working, was, in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Stewart (1915) 138 C. C. A. 444, 223 Fed. 30, held not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to observe a blue flag rule, it being apparent in such a case that an observance of the rule would have been of no avail.

In Offner v. Chicago & E. R. Co. (1912) 174 Ill. App. 82, a blue flag had been put up, but, without the knowledge of the repair man working under the car, another car had been shoved in which obscured the flag from view. The court stated that there was nothing in the rules of the yard that required the repair man to keep watch of the flag after he had placed it in position, to see that no one else took it down, or to watch the track to see that no cars were pushed in on it, so as to obscure the flag from view in violation of the rules of the yard. He had a right to assume that others working there would obey the rule, and the fact that, when the switching crew pushed in on track 8 the car that caused the injury, there was another car there besides the one the repair man was working on, on which other car no flag was exposed, instead of being evidence of negligence on the part of such repair man, strongly tends to show that such other car had been improperly placed there after he went to work and in violation of the rules referred to. There is nothing in the record to warrant the court in holding that the repair man was guilty of contributory negligence.

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Clasin (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 134 S. W. 358, two railroad companies used the same yard; the plaintiff, a car inspector of one railroad, whose duty it was to inspect all the cars of the yard, saw a blue flag on the car and, supposing the work was being done thereunder by other employees, went under the car to work and was injured when an engine backed into the car, defendant's employees in the meantime having removed the flag. It was held a question for the jury under the circumstances whether plaintiff was guilty of negligence in going under the car. The court stated: "Our conclusion of law from the above facts is that they do not present a case which precluded the plaintiff from recovery for the reason that he ignored or violated a rule. A similar rule was in force in regard to both railway companies. The flag was put out, and it was the duty of the defendant and its employees to keep it there, and to refrain from moving it until the work was finished, including the work necessary and proper to be done by plaintiff. No one else than defendant's employees had authority to move it. Plaintiff had seen it posted, and had the right to, and naturally would, assume that it would not be prematurely moved. He did not know that it had been taken away. He was not bound to anticipate that it would or might be moved, and keep his eye upon it, and it was in fact moved by direction of defendant's foreman. The most that can be claimed of plaintiff's action was that he was guilty of negligence; that is to say that, in going under the car, he failed to act under the surrounding conditions as an ordinarily prudent person would have done, and this issue was submitted. Defendant's employees having moved the flag prematurely without plaintiff's knowledge, it was defendant's duty to plaintiff to inform plaintiff of the fact, or to operate its engines and cars upon that track in such manner as to exercise care to injure no one whose presence might have been expected in and about the car in question while the work of repair was in progress."

Where plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the defendant railroad company used the yard of plaintiff's employer to deliver coal to it in cars, removing them when empty, and that it was the custom of the defendant to give notice or warning to the workmen employed in the yard of the movement of cars, and the plaintiff, being directed by his employer to go from one part of the yard to another for the purpose of unloading cars, undertook to pass between the end of a standing car and a bumper, and while doing this, no notice of the movement of the car being given, it was suddenly started by the defendant, and the plaintiff was caught between the car and the bumper and injured, it was held not error, in McNally v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1915) 88 N. J. L. 277, 95 Atl. 975, to refuse a nonsuit upon the ground of absence of negligence on the part of the railroad company; nor was it error to refuse a direction of verdict for defendant upon the ground of plaintiff's contributory negligence. The denial by the defendant company, of the existence of the custom to give notice or warning, presented a jury question.

83 N. J. L. 467, 83 Atl. 896, the place of work of a servant was a pit under a locomotive tender, which was a reasonably safe place unless the tender was moved without warning. There was a custom of giving such a warning, but whether it was given as an incident of the work of the master, or as the duty of the master to warn the servant, was a disputed question. It was held that, where the testimony was conflicting and varying inferences could be drawn from it, this question was for the jury.

Whether a hostler who went under an engine to clean out an ash can, and was injured when the engine suddenly started, was guilty of contributory negligence, was held a question for the jury in St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Arms (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 136 S. W. 1164. The rule prohibiting the use of a chain in pulling ash cans, claimed to have been violated by the servant, was held to have been abrogated.

In Wells v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. (1915) 184 Mich. 289, 151 N. W. 630, an employee of a paper company, while attempting to open a coal pocket under a gondola car, was injured when cars were switched against the one under which he was working; a switchman standing on a wall 8 feet west of the track, seeing no one around the cars on the pit track, signaled the engineer to back up; the switchman gave as a reason for not discovering deceased that the latter was on the east side; that the work of opening the pockets was usually done on the west side, and that he could not see him on the east side without stooping down and looking under the car; these statements were disputed by the plaintiff; it was asserted that deceased was negligent in going under the car and sitting on the east rail while opening the pocket; it was also asserted, and apparently uncontradicted, that deceased was doing the work of opening the pocket in the customary way, and the only way in which it could be done, considering the nature of the structure; it was further contended that, before going under the car, he should have notified the switching crew, who were then working in the vicinity; it was contended on the part of plaintiff that the switching crew had not been switching in that vicinity. In affirming a judgment for plaintiff, the court said that, whatever the record might show about this dispute, if it was the custom to inspect and notify the men around the cars before moving them, and the deceased knew of this custom, he had a right to rely upon its being done in this instance. The trial court left the question with the jury; and that was as favorable a view as the defendant had the right to demand.

In Mitchell v. Toledo, St. L. & W. R. Co. (1912) 117 C. C. A. 24, 197 Fed. 528, an employee who had been ordered by a foreman to assist an inspector in replacing a heavy door on a car was killed when the end car of a cut of cars moved by an engine shoving other cars against them struck the door, and he was hurled under the car; to reach the car on which the door belonged, the men had to carry it over a path 2 feet wide between two strings of cars; the accident happened when they set the door on edge to take a rest before carrying it in between the cars. The court said that it could not be safely assumed as a matter of law that the company was not, through the foreman, chargeable with notice of the order, or with any concern as to the place where it was to be executed, or with the dangers attending the removal of the door to such place, through sudden movement of the cars; that, while it was not clear whether it was meant in the amended petition in the present case to allege that the company had not adopted any rule or means to protect employees engaged in repairing cars, and while rules and regulations in this behalf were alluded to in the amended answer in setting up the defense of alleged contributory negligence (denied in the replication), yet the proof offered as stated was not admitted, and no rule or regulation appeared on the record; but that this state of pleading did not relieve the company of the duty to adopt some means for protecting its car repairers; indeed, for protecting these men when about to enter the passage leading to the side of the car on which they were to restore the door; that it could not be said as a matter of law that the assistant assumed any risk of danger resulting from defendant's negligence, or that the facts touching the assistant's conduct would not admit of any reasonable inference except that of contributory negligence.

The decision in Southern R. Co. v. Smith (1913) 123 C. C. A. 488, 205 Fed. 360, is not within the scope of this note, as it involves injury to a switchman while walking along a track; here the court observed that it could not say that there was no duty whatever to keep a lookout for such switchman; that doubtless it was primarily his duty to keep out of the way, but this did not absolve the engine crew from all obligation; the L.R.A. 1918C.

care required and the duty imposed with reference to the yard employees seen upon the tracks are much less in degree than with reference to strangers; but defendant's theory of no duty would extend to a case where an employee was obviously helpless on the track, and might have been seen for some time from the coming engine; it would permit the engine crew to run through the yard with their eyes shut, and it is too broad; under such facts as here exist, there must be a concurrent or secondary duty, independent of statute or rule, to keep such lookout as is reasonably necessary to avoid injury to the employee who may neglect his primary duty to protect himself.

It is ordinarily negligence for an employee to pass under or between cars likely to be moved at any moment. See cases in the note in 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 879.

And recovery has been denied where an employee was injured by a sudden movement of cars when he was attempting to pass between them. Koke v. Andrews Steel Co. (1912) 149 Ky. 627, 149 S. W. 968; Hinson v. Atlanta & C. Air Line R. Co. (1916) 172 N. C. 646, 90 S. E. 772 (under Employers' Liability Act); Hall v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. (1910) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 125 S. W. 946; Plachetko v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (1918) — Minn. —, 166 N. W. 338 (repair man injured while working between cars); Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cook (1912) 150 Ky. 689, 150 S. W. 802 (engine inspector injured by hot water from blowpipe while in pit under engine inspecting chafing iron); Doucette v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1914) 77 N. H. 419, 92 Atl. 738 (employee going between cars to relieve himself when he might have seen an engine approaching had he looked).

In Gignac v. Studebaker Corp. (1915) 186 Mich. 574, 152 N. W. 1037, an employee of the defendant corporation, without stopping to see where the trainmen were, and without knowing but that they were signaling the train to back up or go ahead, placed his foot on a coupling in attempting to cross between a water tank and the end car, whereby his foot was crushed as the engine backed up. The court stated that, while it was clear that the claimant's injury was brought about by his own gross negligence, it was of the opinion that it could not be said as a matter of law that he was guilty of such intentional and wilful misconduct as would defeat recovery under the Workman's Compensation Act.

Whether a car inspector was guilty of negligence in passing between cars was held a question for the jury in Gjorvad v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. (1911) 116 Minn. 233, 133 N. W. 609, the court stating that, assuming that the evidence warranted the jury in finding that the head end of the train had come to a standstill with a space of 3 or 4 feet between the rear car and the stationary cars, the inspector would have a right to assume, in the absence of a signal from the engineer, that the head end would not back, and therefore that it would be safe to pass between the cars; and that it was not prepared to say that it was conclusively a reckless or dangerous act.

Generally, where an opening has been left between standing cars for persons to pass through, it is incumbent upon those moving the cars to give timely notice of their intention so to do before backing against the cars and closing up the space; in such a case an employee is not guilty of negligence as matter of law in passing between the cars. See the note in 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 880.

So, in Le Gwin v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (1915) 170 N. C. 359, 87 S. E. 99, an employee was held not guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to pass through cars intentionally separated for the benefit of employees, although by going about 100 feet he could have passed around the car in safety.

In Janilus v. International Paper Co. (1914) 112 Me. 519, 92 Atl. 653, a laborer returning to other employment after finishing his work of unloading a car was injured when cars between which he was passing, which had been separated to let the men through, were forced together by an engine. The court stated that plaintiff had the right to assume in the absence of knowledge to the contrary, that he could work in safety. He had been working but three days, and it cannot be said as matter of law that he assumed the risk. He had the further right to rely upon the belief that defendant had performed the duty of furnishing him a reasonably safe place in which to perform his work.

Where a servant in the course of his employment attempted to pass between cars instead of taking a safe way through a tunnel, whereby he was crushed when the cars were brought together, the court, in Arnold v. Douglas & Co. (1916) 176 Iowa, 405, 155 N. W. 845, said that he was, of course, bound to know that a crossing over a railroad track where cars are frequently moving is a place of danger, and to adjust his conduct with reference thereto. But in crossing the yard he was in pursuit of his employer's business, and if he took the course generally taken by the great body of the employees with the knowledge and consent of the defendant, and the course taken by the officers, foremen, and others immediately representing the defendant, then he was not a trespasser, and the question whether he exercised reasonable care in choosing the route over the tracks instead of through the tunnel was for the jury, even though he chose the more dangerous one. In this case the employer was held liable in view of the custom known and acquiesced in by it, the court stating that the opening was apparently in the direct line of the way from the feed mill across to the office or shop which the servant was trying to reach in performance of the duties with which he was charged, and that it could not say that he was not justified in assuming that the passage had been opened to enable him and others to make their way across, and that it would not be suddenly closed upon him without warning.

So, where for convenience, as was customary with other employees, a servant went from the "heavy side" of a yard to the "light side" to get material, and was killed while passing between cars, the court, in Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Short (1916) 171 Ky. 647, 188 S. W. 786, in holding the railroad company liable, said that the servant was not prohibited by any rule of the company from going to the light side of the yard; that it was customary for repair men to go any place in the yard where they could find the repair parts needed; that the servant came to his death while he was in the course of his employment, and that therefore the company owed him the same duty or care that it would have owed him if he had been working as a repair man on the light side of the yard. And, this being so, the fact that he went to the light side of the yard to get the material was not such negligence on his part as would preclude a recovery by his administrator upon the theory that his conduct was the sole cause of his death. He may have been guilty of contributory negligence in going between the cars without first satisfying himself that the place was free from danger, but the failure on his part to exercise this degree of care would not under the Employers' Liability Act prevent a recovery.

ery; it would only go to diminish the amount of the recovery. The court quotes as follows from Illinois C. R. Co. v. Skaggs (1915) 240 U. S. 66, 60 L. ed. 528, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 249, involving, however, injury to a brakeman by being knocked off the tender of an engine: "It cannot be said that there can be no recovery simply because the injured employee participated in the act which caused the injury. The inquiry must be whether there is neglect on the part of the employing carrier, and, if the injury to one employee resulted 'in whole or in part' from the negligence of any of its other employees, it is liable under the express terms of the act; that is, the statute abolished the fellow servant rule. If the injury was due to the neglect of a coemployee in the performance of his duty, that neglect must be attributed to the employer; and if the injured employee was himself guilty of negligence contributing to the injury, the statute expressly provides that it 'shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employee.'"

The failure of one who goes under or between cars to warn others of his presence not only bears upon the question of his own contributory negligence, when that is a defense, but may also tend to relieve the defendant of the charge of negligence, and thus negative any ground of action even under a statute like the Federal Employers' Liability Act, under which contributory negligence is not a defense. That phase of the subject, however, is not within the scope of the note, but a few cases are cited to illustrate the point.

Thus, where a car repairer went under a car to work in violation of a rule requiring the posting of signals, and was injured when other cars were moved against the one under which he was working, it was held, in Kentucky & T. R. Co. v. Minton (1915) 167 Ky. 516, 180 S. W. 831, that he could not recover either under the Federal Employers' Liability Act or the Federal Safety Appliance Act, having failed to show negligence of defendant toward him,—a prerequisite to recovery under either of the aforesaid acts. And another reason suggested by the court why a recovery should not be allowed against defendant under the Federal Employers' Liability Act was that plaintiff was not an employee of defendant, but of another railroad company, defendant's codefendant, L.R.A.1918C.

and by the express terms of the Employers' Liability Act, the carrier is liable to its employees only, for negligence resulting in their injury.

In Helm v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. (1913) 156 Ky. 240, 160 S. W. 945, an action brought under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, it is pointed out that the decision upon the appeal in (1912) 149 Ky. 340, 148 S. W. 25, which was brought under the state law, was not upon the ground that the plaintiff, who was a detective in the employ of defendant, engaged in examining car seals, was guilty of contributory negligence because he had concealed himself between the cars, but upon the ground that, he being concealed, there was no negligence on the part of the company's employees in moving the cars; and the same position was adhered to upon the appeal in the subsequent action, the court being of the opinion that there was no material change in the facts.

So, where a servant was injured while passing between cars to get material, there was a like ruling on similar facts in Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Mitchell (1915) 184 Ind. 588, 110 N. E. 680, under the Employers' Liability Act making an employer, with five or more persons employed, liable to an employee for negligent injury by a fellow servant, the effect of the act being to abrogate the assumed risk rule in so far as it applied to the particular risk of injury by a fellow servant. The court said that, if the danger was inherent or apparent in the employment, it might be appropriate to consider the question of the application of so much of the Employers' Liability Act as reads as follows: "In actions brought against any employer, . . . it shall not be a defense that the dangers or hazards inherent or apparent in the employment in which such injured employee was engaged contributed to such injury." However, the application of the statute was not discussed in the brief of either party, and in view of the conclusion reached the court did not consider the question. An instruction was erroneous under the common-law rule, which sought a direction of nonliability regardless of the element of knowledge, actual or constructive, on the part of the servant, of the danger in the way chosen. It is only where the servant has actual or constructive knowledge of the danger that recovery is precluded.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

E. P. MOORHEAD, Respt.,
v.
MINNEAPOLIS SEED COMPANY, Appt.

JOSEPHINE MATHEWS, Respt.,
v.
SAME, Appt.

(— Minn.—, 165 N. W. 484.)

Evidence — sufficiency.

1. The evidence sustains a finding of the jury that in the course of negotiations with the plaintiffs the vice president and general manager of the defendant corporation made an oral warranty of the germinating power of seed wheat sold them; and the effect of such warranty was not as a matter of law annulled by printed disclaimers of warranty in the letter of confirmation, invoice, and shipping tags, though the contract was oral and within the Statute of Frauds.

For other cases, see Evidence, XII. i; Sale, II. c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Corporation — warranty — authority of officers.

2. The vice president and general manager of the defendant, who had general charge of its office and plant, had authority to bind it by a warranty, though the making of warranties on the sale of seed grain was contrary to the custom of the trade.

For other cases, see Corporations, IV. g, 2, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Damages — failure of seed.

3. Where there is an entire failure of germination and therefore no crop, the measure of damages for the breach of warranty of germination is the amount paid for the seed, plus the cost of planting, plus the value of the use of the land for the cropping season, less the value of its use for a proper purpose to which it might reasonably have been put upon the ascertainment of a failure of germination, and not the value of the crop which would have been raised if the seed had been true to warranty, less the cost of planting and producing.

For other cases, see Damages, III. a, 4, c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Evidence — sufficiency.

4. Whether the evidence sustains a finding that there was a breach of warranty in respect of the germinating power of the seed is questioned, but not decided.

For other cases, see Evidence, XII. i, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County denying its alternative motion for judgment or for a new trial in consolidated actions brought to recover damages for breach of an express warranty of the germinating power of seed wheat. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Koon, Whelan, & Hempstead for appellant:

The evidence fails to establish the alleged contract of warranty of the quality and germination of the seed wheat in question, as a matter of law.

Cas. 540.

Whatever warranty of said seed wheat defendant's manager may have given to plaintiffs, it was given without the authority, express or implied, of defendant, and did not bind it contractually.

The true rule for the measure of damages in cases of total loss of crop arising from failure of seeds to germinate and grow is the amount of money paid by plaintiffs for the seed wheat in question, the amount expended in cultivating and preparing the lands in question for planting and sowing said wheat, and the reasonable rent to compensate for the loss of the use of said lands resulting from the total loss of crop, subject to be reduced by the amount for which the lands could have been rented for some other crop after discovery that said seed wheat would not germinate and grow.

Messrs. Stiles & Devaney, George C. Stiles, and D. C. Edwards for respondents.

Dibell, C., filed the following opinion:

These two actions to recover for the breach of an express warranty of the germinating power of seed wheat were tried together and there were verdicts for the plaintiffs. The defendant appeals from the order denying its alternative motion for judgment or a new trial.

The questions are these:

(1) Whether the evidence sustains a finding that an express warranty on the sale of seed wheat was made on behalf of the defendant by its vice president and general manager; and in connection with this, the effect of disclaimers of warranty printed on the letterhead confirming the sale, on the invoice, and on the shipping tags.

(2) Whether, in view of the custom not to warrant the germinating power of seed sold, the vice president and general manager had authority to bind the defendant by a warranty.

(3) Whether the measure of damages, there being an entire failure of germination and a consequent total loss of crop, is the value of the crop which would have been raised had the seed been true to warranty, less the cost of planting and producing, or the cost of the seed, plus the value of the use of the land, plus expenses incurred, less the value of the use of the land after the failure of germination.

(4) Whether the evidence sustains a finding that the seed was lacking in germinating power.

(1) About April 1, 1915, the plaintiffs entered into negotiations with the defendant through R. M. Johnston, its vice president and general manager, for the purchase of blue stem seed wheat for the seeding of their farms near Anamoose, North Dakota. Their testimony is that they told him that they had had trouble with germination, and inquired whether he would guarantee the seed which he proposed selling, and that he then warranted it to be of 99 per cent germinating power. By common understanding the question of purchase was left open and was shortly afterwards closed over the telephone by an acceptance by the plaintiffs. By letter of April 6, the sale was confirmed in the usual way. At the top of the letter of confirmation was printed the following: "We give no warranty, express or implied, as to description, quality, productiveness, or any other matter, of any seeds we send out, and we will not in any way be responsible for the crop. If purchaser does not accept the seeds on these terms, they are to be returned at once. No complaints received after ten days from receipt of goods."

The wheat was sold f. o. b. and was delivered to the plaintiffs on April 6, on board a Soo car, the invoice was dated on that day, the bill of lading was issued to one of the plaintiffs on April 7, they prepaid the freight, the price was paid the defendant probably on April 8, and the wheat reached Anamoose on April 13, and was accepted by the tenants of the plaintiffs, and used in seeding. The invoice contained a printed disclaimer of warranty similar to that on the letter of confirmation, and a like disclaimer was on the shipping tags, on the reverse side of the address.

Johnston denies that a guaranty was asked or given, but says that there was some talk about germinating tests. No warranty was given in the letter of confirmation, but the results of germination tests were stated, and, so far as appears, were truthful. It is the contention of the defendant that, taking the evidence as a whole, it is insufficient to sustain a finding of a warranty; and it relies considerably upon the disclaimers of warranty. The contract of sale was oral and within the Statute of Frauds, and invalid until acceptance of the wheat or payment. Payment and acceptance pursuant to the contract satisfied the statute. Scott v. T. W. Stevenson Co. 130 Minn. 151, 153 N. W. 316; Perkins v. Thorson, 50 Minn. 85, 52 N. W. 272. Until payment or acceptance the contract was not complete or binding, a new term might be imported into it, or a term important in the negotiations might be eliminated at the will of either. The defendant cites on the question of disclaimers of warranty a line of cases of which Ross v. Northrup, K. & Co. 156 Wis. 327, 144 N. W. 1124; Blizzard Bros. v. Growers' Canning Co. 152 Iowa, 257, 132 N. W. 66; and Seattle Seed Co. v. Fujimori, 79 Wash. 123, 139 Pac. 866, may be taken as typical. Some of the cases of this character bear upon the question of an implied warranty that what is sold is true to variety or tradename. Here there is no question of implied warranty. The cases do not go so far as to hold that if an express warranty is made its effect is obviated by the use of letters or invoices or shipping tags on which disclaimers are printed. We would not expect such a holding. These disclaimers are evidentiary in support of the defendant's contention. That far they should have effect. They are not conclusive. If a warranty was actually made during the negotiations, and not withdrawn or modified, it should be given effect irrespective of the printed disclaimers. See Edgar v. Joseph Breck & Sons Corp. 172 Mass. 581, 52 N. E. 1083.

The evidence in support of the warranty is not particularly convincing. There is much to indicate that the parties were talking about germinating tests, and not of a warranty of germinating power. However, there is evidence that the plaintiffs wanted to buy a warranty as well as seed, and that Johnston undertook to promise germinating results. The jury might well enough have found that there was no such promise, but instead they found that there was. We are dealing with a finding of the jury approved by the trial judge, who was in much better position than we are for judging testimony, and not with what we may think from a reading of the evidence might as well or better have been found. We hold that the evidence sustains the finding.

(2) The next question is upon the authority of Johnston to make a guaranty binding upon his corporation.

The argument of defendant is that when a custom of the trade not to warrant is shown, and here there was evidence of such a custom which for the purposes of this appeal we assume to be conclusive, authority to warrant cannot be implied. The theory is that implied authority in a selling agent to warrant comes from the fact that sales in the particular trade are commonly made with warranty, and when such is not the custom authority cannot be implied. Upton v. Suffolk County Mills, 11 Cush. 586, 59 Am. Dec. 163; Wait v. Borne, 123 N. Y. 592, 25 N. E. 1053; Bierman v. City Mills Co. 151 N. Y. 482, 37 L.R.A. 799, 56 Am. St. Rep. 635, 45 N. E. 856; Waupaca Electric Light & R. Co. v. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. 112 Wis. 460, 88 N. W. 308; 2 C. J. 601; 31 Cyc. 1353; 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 165; Williston, Sales, § 445; 2 Mechem. Sales, §§ 1281 et seq.

Johnston was the vice president of the corporation and its general manager. He was in charge of its offices and plant. It does not appear that any other executive officer was about. So far as can be seen, one dealing with him was as near the corporate entity as he could get. Unless a purchaser could take a warranty from him he could get none from anyone. There was, somewhere, corporate power to warrant. Conceding the rule of law claimed, and that a custom not to warrant was conclusively proved, we are of the opinion that a vice president and general manager having such charge of the company's operations and such general authority as is shown has implied authority to make a warranty binding the corporation.

(3) There was no germination and the failure of crop was total. The court held that the measure of damages was the value of the crop which would have been raised had the seed been true to warranty, less the expense of planting and producing. The defendant contends that the measure where the loss is total should be based upon the value of the use of the land of which the owner is deprived, plus the value of seed grain used and expenses incurred, and less any value in the use of the land after the failure of the seed to germinate. Where there is a partial crop, or crop of different variety than that promised by the warranty, the proper measure is the difference in value between the crop raised and the crop which would have been raised had the seed responded to the warranty. Randall v. Raper, El. Bl. & El. 84, 120 Eng. Reprint, 438, 27 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 266, 4 Jur. N. S. 662, 6 Week. Rep. 445; Wolcott v. Mount, 36 N. J. L. 262, 13 Am. Rep. 438; Passinger v. Thorburn, 34 N. E. 1083; Dunn v. Bushnell, 63 Neb. 568, 93 Am. St. Rep. 474, 88 N. W. 693; Moody v. Peirano, 4 Cal. App. 411, 88 Pac. 380; Buckbee v. P. Hohenadel, Jr. Co. L.R.A.1916C, 1001, 139 C. C. A. 478, 224 Fed. 14; Grafton-Stamps Drug Co. v. Williams, 105 Miss. 296, 62 So. 273; Cline v. Mock, 150 Mo. App. 431, 131 S. W. 710; American Warehouse Co. v. Ray, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 50 S. W. 763. Where there has been no germination it has been held that the damages should be measured by the cost of the seed, plus the cost of planting, plus the value of the use of the land, less any value in the use remaining at the time the seed failed to germinate. Reiger v. Worth, 127 N. C. 230, 52 L.R.A. 362, 80 Am. St. Rep. 798, 37 S. E. 217. It is manifest that where there is a partial crop, and that is the usual case, the first measure is the true one. There is no other. Some of the cases involving partial failures and applying the first measure distinctly state that the second measure is the true one when the loss is total. Vaughan's Seed

Store v. Stringfellow, 56 Fla. 708, 48 So. 410; Ford v. Farmers' Exch. 136 Tenn. 287, L.R.A.1917B, 1106, 180 S. W. 368. Still there are cases applying rather as a matter of course and without discussion the first measure when the failure is total. Shaw v. Smith, 45 Kan. 334, 11 L.R.A. 681, 25 Pac. 886; Crutcher v. Elliott, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 592; Van Wyck v. Allen, 69 N. Y. 61, 25 Am. Rep. 136; Depew v. Peck Hardware Co. 121 App. Div. 28, 105 N. Y. Supp. 390. The question does not often arise and is hardly considered in the cases cited. It is considered in treatises with scant recognition of the distinction, and there are few cases illustrating it. Williston, Sales, § 614; 2 Mechem, Sales, §§ 1827 et seq.; 1 Sutherland, Damages, § 61; 2 Sedgw. Damages, §§ 191, 768; 3 Joyce, Damages, § 1707; 35 Cyc. 479; 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 219; 43 Century Dig. Sales, § 1294; 17 Decen. Dig. id. § 442 (11). Writers, so far as they meet the question at all, join in approval of the second measure stated when the failure is entire. 2 Sedgw. Damages, §§ 191, 768; 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 219; 35 Cyc. 479.

The object of the law is to furnish a measure which will give, as near as may be, actual compensation for the breach, and which is free of uncertain, contingent, conjectural, or speculative elements. When damages are based upon the value of the use of the land the uncertainty of amount because of uncertainty of crop results is eliminated, and they may be assessed forthwith. We are of the opinion that when the failure of crop is entire, because of failure of germination, the damages should be based on the value of the use, with additions and deductions suiting the conditions of the particular case. The objection suggested by the plaintiffs that there was no fixed rental value in North Dakota is without substantial merit. There need be no market rental value. It is enough if the use value is determined, and that may be found without the aid of a market value. Farmers and others qualified to testify may furnish proof of value. In Nelson v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 41 Minn. 131, 42 N. W. 788, Justice Mitchell, in a case involving a question of at least as great difficulty, said: "What the law aims at is compensation; and the matter of ascertaining the rental value, or how much it has been depreciated, is a practical question, to be treated in a practical way, and to the consideration of which it is necessary to bring a little of the farmer as well as the lawyer."

(4) The defendant contends that the finding of the jury that the seed lacked ger-minating power is unsustained by the evidence. The situation presented is peculiar. The seed was bought for three farms, the Moorhead farm, the Mathews farm, and the Roberts farm. It was put into separate sacks and those intended for each of the farms were separately designated by the shipping tags. It was shipped in one car to Anamoose. One Okert, who was the tenant for Moorhead and Mathews, hauled the seed for their farms. One Budeau, who was the tenant of Roberts, hauled the seed for the Roberts farm. Okert planted the Moorhead and Mathews farms and the seed failed to germinate. Before planting he submitted it to a formaldehyde treatment. Budeau planted his without treatment and it grew well. Altogether 475 bushels went to the Moorhead, Mathews, and Roberts farms. It came, as the evidence tends to show, and perhaps shows conclusively, from a mass of 752 bushels in the defendant's warehouse. This left 277 bushels. Of this amount 273 bushels were delivered at Madison Lake, Minnesota, and planted by twelve different farmers. All of it grew well. The remaining four bushels are not accounted for. Budeau had 5 bushels left. He let Okert have this, and he planted it on the Mathews land after submitting it to the formaldehyde treatment. It grew well. The growing season and soil conditions were good. Other wheat planted by Okert and submitted to the formaldehyde treatment grew. The seed furnished was good in appearance. It is claimed by the defendant that the formaldehyde treatment destroyed the germination. There is evidence that this treatment should be applied with some caution and that there is some danger attendant upon its use. It is difficult to understand how seed wheat of almost any kind, and especially that having the appearance of this, would fail to germinate to the extent claimed; that is, not a few per cent of it, but more than 95 per cent. The formaldehyde treatment may be attended with some danger, but it is difficult to understand how its ordinary use could destroy not a small percentage of it but 95 per cent. There is some difficulty in saying that the evidence sustains a finding that the wheat was without germinating power. There must be a new trial for the reasons stated in paragraph 3, and we leave the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to show lack of germinating power undecided. Additional evidence may be produced at another trial. It is not at this time a case for judgment notwithstanding.

Order reversed.

Sykes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, Yazoo City, filed suit in the chancery court of Yazoo county against Hugh W. McCormick and the appellant company, surety on the official bond of McCormick as city clerk of Yazoo City. A decree was rendered in favor of the city for the sum of $942.59, and the surety company alone prosecutes this appeal to this court.

The bond made by the appellant company is in the usual form of surety bonds. The condition of the bond alleged to have been breached is that portion reading as follows: "That if the said Hugh W. McCormick shall, from the 5th day of December, 1910, well and faithfully perform all the duties of the said office."

The bill alleges that the said McCormick failed and neglected and refused to account for and pay over to the complainant the sum of $942.59. The testimony in the lower court was conflicting as to whether or not the city clerk, as a matter of fact, received this money; but the chancellor decided this fact in favor of the appellee. We will therefore state the facts as found by the chancellor.

During the life of the bond in suit, and while McCormick was the city clerk, a Mr. Rivers, the superintendent of the street car line in Yazoo City, which line belongs to the city, from time to time, paid over to McCormick, city clerk, the amount of $942.59. This amount McCormick failed to turn over to the city, but appropriated it to his own use. The testimony in the case shows that the only moneys which could be collected by the city clerk were those due as city tax privilege licenses. At the time of the alleged defalcation there was an ordinance of the city, duly and legally adopted, and in full force and effect, § 3 of which is as follows: "All moneys collected by the said Rivers shall be paid into the city depository, to the credit of the street railway fund, and no moneys shall be paid out except upon warrant of this board."

One of the banks had been regularly selected as a city depository. Despite the above ordinance, the testimony shows that Mr. Rivers had ignored the same with the knowledge of the city officials, and had made a practice of turning over to the city clerk the street railway money.

It is the contention of the appellant surety company that, since the payment of this money by the superintendent of the street car line to the city clerk was in direct violation of the city ordinance in effect when these payments were made, and since the only moneys which could be collected by the city clerk were those for privilege tax licenses, then this money was not paid to the clerk either virtute officii or colore officii, and therefore it was not in the contemplation of the surety on this bond, and that it could not be held liable for this money.
